PREFACE.

Monsignor S. Rodolfo Dalgado's Influencia do Vocabulario Portuguez em Linguas Asiaticas (abragendo cerca de cinquenta idiomas) published by the Academy of Sciences, Lisbon, was issued in 1913, and at once received a very warm welcome from Orientalists all over Europe interested in philological studies.

Sir George Grierson, then in England, thanked the author heartily for his most valuable and interesting work for which, he said, he had been wishing for many years and which would be of the greatest help to him in the linguistic survey of India, just as his excellent Konkani dictionary had been till then. Professors Sylvain Levi and A. Cabaton from Paris, J. Cornu from Austria, and Hugo Schuchardt from Graz, among others, acclaimed the work as an enduring monument to Portugal and a most valuable contribution to Oriental studies, the materials of which, collected with infinite labour, had been put together with great learning and precision.

But except Portuguese India, as was to be expected, no other part of India had heard of the author's name, let alone of this or any other book of his. The irony of the situation is obvious; for though the result of the laborious examination of about fifty different Asiatic languages in search of Portuguese words might make the Portuguese justly and pardonably proud of the part they once played in the cultural history of the East and particularly of India, such a study can have a present-day value and importance only to those in India, Ceylon, Malaya, and other parts of Asia interested in the history and development of their respective vernaculars. The situation was brought about purely because Dr. Dalgado's Vocabulario, to give the work the name by which it is generally known, is in Portuguese, and scarcely any Indian Orientalist to-day possesses a working knowledge of that language.

With the object of introducing Dalgado's work to those interested in such studies, I read before the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society a paper entitled: The Portuguese Legacy to the East or the Influence of Portuguese on the Languages of the East with special reference to the Languages of the Bombay Presidency. This was in 1922. A paragraph from its concluding part will bear quotation here, in as much as it explains my motive in reading it and, at the same time, makes an avowal of my indebtedness for my materials to the Vocabulario.

'It remains for me to acknowledge my great and grateful debt to Dr. S. Rodolfo Dalgado's Influencia do Vocabulario Portugues em Linguas Asiaticas (abrangendo cerca de cinquenta idiomas). The student who wishes to study from a scientific and philosophical standpoint the process by which the gradual transplantation of the exotic words on Asiatic soil was affected will find the introduction to this great work of absorbing interest. The book which is published by the University Press, Coimbra, and brought out under the auspices of the Academy of Sciences, Lisbon, is in Portuguese, a language unknown to the majority of scholars in India. I am sure that, on this very account, a few brief remarks on the character of this work as well as on the career and achievements of the indefatigable orientalist and philologist, its author, will not be out of place.' And the very same reasons have determined the inclusion of a sketch of the author's life and work in this volume.

The paper was published in the Society's Journal No. LXXIV, Vol. XXVI, and it was not long before I had the satisfaction of finding that my object had in some measure been realised. The few inquiries which had reached me before, consequent on the brief summary of the paper having appeared in the Times of India, Bombay, now increased both in number and in purposefulness. Almost without a single exception my correspondents regretted their inability to read the Monsignor's works in the original and also the absence of an English translation of the most important of them. The Vocabulario, in my view, was the one of all his works that would interest scholars in India in as much as it would help them to apprehend the nature and extent of the indebtedness of their own vernaculars to the earliest European language they came into contact with in modern times, just as his Glossario Luso-Asiatico would interest Portuguese—one might well say European—students anxious to understand the East and to realise the extent to which Portuguese expansion there, whether commercial, political, or missionary, has enriched their vocabularies.

Accordingly, I applied to the Lisbon Academy of Sciences,—Dr. Dalgado had, meanwhile, after gathering in his rich and abundant harvest, gone to his eternal reward on the 4th of April, 1922,—for permission to bring out an English translation of the Vocabulario, and I wish to express here my grateful recognition of its courtesy and kindness in promptly granting my request.

Almost a whole decade had elapsed between the publication of the Vocabulario and my decision to present it in English, and during this interval its author had brought out other works on cognate subjects. In these latter he had occasionally arrived at opinions and results different from those he had put forward before, or supported the earlier views with additional evidence, or sometimes provided a fuller and more detailed exposition of a philological or phonetic law which had been concisely set out in the Vocabulario. Moreover the bibliography annexed to the present work, very extensive though it is, gives evidence that some sources of information had remained unknown or were inaccessible to the author, whilst others had become available only after the publication of his book, and this was the case particularly with those wherein are to be found a large number of terms derived from Portuguese, once current in Anglo-India. It is true, he has derived his materials under this head from the well-known Glossary of Wilson, the Dictionary of Whitworth, and Crooke's edition of Yule and Burnell's monumental and fascinating volume; but, since the last-named made its appearance, much published material—new volumes, in the Hakluyt Society's publications, in Foster's Letters, and English Factories in India, and of the Indian Antiquary, etc., . . . had become available. The New Oxford English Dictionary which the author does not appear to have known or consulted was also approaching completion.

In view of all this I decided that it would enhance the utility of my translation if I incorporated in it the alterations or additions that the new material had made necessary or possible. The additions have been in the main with reference to Anglo-Indian terms which owe their existence to Portuguese, and they have not been confined to etymological investigations alone but been extended to various other fields—historical, sociological, botanical, zoological, etc. which I thought might provoke the reader's interest, and at the same time relieve to some extent the baldness, as a rule, inseparable from a Vocabulary.

The author, as is but natural, considering the nature of his work, quotes usually from the early Portuguese chronicles in support of the currency of a Portuguese vocable in the East. I thought that it would promote both enquiry and interest among English-speaking readers if I were to give the reference to the relative passage in the English version of the text when such existed, and there are not a few of them in the Hakluyt Society's series. This, with very few instances excepted, I have done.

There are many Anglo-Indian words in the Vocabulario for which the author provides quotations; in the case of quite a number of others, he does not do so—the nature of his study did not demand them. I have endeavoured to supply the lacunæ, and, when this had to be done in regard to vocables which had been already dealt with in Hobson-Jobson, I aimed at providing, whenever possible, citations other or earlier in point of time than those given by Yule and Burnell. In furnishing references for the various forms sometimes assumed by a term, I have chiefly been moved by considerations of tracing the evolution of its orthography before it became finally stabilised.

Several locutions at one time employed in Anglo-India, as is evidenced by their use in correspondence or accounts of travels, have found neither a place in Hobson-Jobson nor the New Oxford English Dictionary, or only in one of them, and when such have been listed by me, I thought it useful to mention this fact, or that other one that some of the quotations I have been fortunate to light upon belong to an earlier date than those in either or both these works. •

The Vocabulario was primarily addressed to the Portuguese, and it was presumably to acquaint even such of them as have no interest in philology with the great linguistic legacy their forefathers have bequeathed to the East, that, at the conclusion of his study, the author provided a general alphabetical list of all the Portuguese words that had found an entry into the languages of Asia, and also separate lists of these words, language by language. I decided to eliminate the general list and in place of it have provided a general index of all words and names in the book. Instead of the separate lists I have prepared for each of the fifty languages an alphabetical index of these very words but in the forms they have assumed in the foreign idioms and, to facilitate reference, have set against each the original Portuguese vocable. In the list of Konkani words derived from Portuguese—their number is legion—the author gives in quite a large number of cases the vernacular idiom which the foreign term has displaced; in those others in which he did not do so I have attempted to supply the omission. The additions made by me, except in the case of the lists, are marked by square brackets, and the material which came to hand after the pages wherein it could have been incorporated had been struck off is put together in a supplement at the close.

The new matter increased the text to almost two and a half times the bulk of the original and the problem of finding the ways and means to bring out the volume would have remained insoluble had it not been for the gracious and personal interest which the Maharaja Gaekwad of Baroda took in the work and the decision of His Highness' Government to finance its publication.

The spontaneous generosity of this great Prince in assisting enterprises that conduce to the cultural or social advancement of his countrymen has become proverbial both in the East and the West. Himself a keen student of languages, Indian and European, he has given proof of his interest in linguistic researches *by having had the Shree Sayaji Shastama Shabda Kalpatri—a comparative dictionary of administrative terms in seven Indian languages—compiled and published ; and everyone in India who has at heart the unification and cultural progress of India is aware how much the movement for making Hindi the lingua franca of India owes to this Ruler. I venture to take this opportunity of recording my indebtedness and grateful thanks to His Highness and his Government.

It remains for me now to thank, besides the many friends who have shown interest in my work, rendered help, and put up with and answered not a few importunate questions, Miss Olive da Cunha, B.A., for offering to let me use her copy of the Vocabulario presented to her by the author, which contained corrections and additions made by him—the latter have been shown within parallel lines in the present edition ; Dr. Mariano José Saldanha, Professor of Sanskrit, Lisbon University, for his advice regarding the transliteration of certain Konkani phonetics ; Mr. Vitus P. de Sá, Solicitor, Bombay, for placing at my disposal letters from Orientalists in Europe received by his uncle, the Monsignor, from which I have quoted ; and my daughter Florence who has rendered me very useful assistance in the dreary task of preparing the language lists and the general index and in revising their proofs.

A. X. SOARES.

A SKETCH OF THE AUTHOR'S LIFE.

The primary object with which the translation of the Vocabulario has been undertaken is to introduce the work to English-knowing students, specially in India, because of the new light it is expected to throw on many a problem which has been baffling lexicographers of modern Indian languages, and also on the question, much discussed at the present day, as to what have been the cultural results that have followed the impact of the West on the East; a secondary, but of no less moment, is to introduce the author to his countrymen—to all who, whether differing in race, creed or political allegiance, claim India as their motherland—and to them he is practically unknown. He is one of India's distinguished sons, born, bred, and nurtured on her soil, notwithstanding which, he has not been accorded by his compatriots the recognition that is his due. One is led to say this because hardly one student of Indology in a hundred has even heard of his name; and because in a publication entitled Eminent Orientalists which the well-known publishing house of G. A. Natesan & Co. brought out some few years ago no mention even is made of one who, as will be seen, has claim to an honoured place in the roll of Indian Oriental scholars. And this claim is based not only on his having devoted the greater part of his life to the study of Sanskrit and the many Indo-Aryan tongues derived from it, and to those branches of Oriental research to which one with his knowledge as well of the languages and the scientific method of the West alone could do justice, but also because he never allowed his studies to overshadow his interest in India and his affection for her; far from it, if anything, they helped him to understand better her great past, realise more vividly her present needs, and bestow greater thought on her future.

His eminence in the field of Oriental studies is unquestionable. He was one of the very few Indians enrolled among the 'thirty' whom the Royal Asiatic Society of London at any one time honours with its honorary membership, and we shall at this stage forbear mentioning honours that came to him from other learned societies not as well known to readers in India. There is one fact, however, connected with his life and work which calls for mention even now and it is sure to secure from scholars in India and the East the sympathy and admiration which those of Europe felt for him. During the years he was engaged in compiling his monumental works, in order to avoid worse consequences to his health, he had to undergo surgical operations requiring the amputation of both his legs, one after the other, at the short interval of about three years. And the picture of this ardent and untiring Oriental scholar, alone and away from his home, his only constant companions and faithful friends, the dictionaries of Eastern tongues and Portuguese and other European chronicles, his truncated body resting in an invalid's chair—a veritable Procrustean bed,—from which he lectured to his students, and on which, with heroic resignation, he worked away at his books, is as moving as it is sustaining.

His works are in Portuguese—a language which till the middle of the eighteenth century was the lingua franca of India, but to-day is practically unknown here except to a microscopic section of the population and that limited to a small proportion of the Portuguese possessions in India. Again, he bore a name which could easily lead the indiscriminating to regard him as a non-Indian. What wonder then that his countrymen, had they even heard of him and his works, should have failed to pierce the disguises of name and language and discover in him one of their kindred?

For Sebastião Rodolfo Dalgado was born in Assagão, Bardez, Goa, of a distinguished Brahmin family which for generations had occupied a place of prominence and privilege in the economy of the village. In the sixteenth century, Christianity on the west coast of India was not content with washing off the original sin and subsequent lapses of its recruits, but insisted on wiping away every trace of the ancestral lineage and traditions. It was then that the cognomen of his family 'Desai', so significant, and racy of the soil, was made to yield place to the unmeaning and alien 'Dalgado'. He was one of a family of six brothers and an only sister; one of the brothers died young, two pursued the profession of medicine and two of law.

Young Rodolfo went to school in his village and afterwards at Mapuça, the chief town of his district. Early in life he felt the call towards a priestly vocation and joined the well-known College for ecclesiastical studies at Rachol, in the district of Salsete, Goa, where, after going through his preliminary studies, which included knowledge of English and French and the prescribed course of Philosophy and Theology, in Latin, he was ordained priest in 1881. Very soon afterwards he proceeded to Rome, acquired knowledge of Italian, and joined the University of St. Apollinarius to study Canon and Roman Law. The Doctorate in both these faculties was conferred upon him two years later. As a special case, perhaps because of his noteworthy success in the law schools, he was allowed to sit for the examination of the Doctor's degree in Divinity, which involved his learning Greek and Hebrew, without having to keep terms. He came out of the test with distinction. These results, together with the awards of prizes and medals which accompanied them, brought the Indian cleric to the notice of the then reigning Pope, Leo XIII, who appointed him his Honorary chaplain with the title of 'Monsignor'. This was on the 11th October, 1884, when he was only twenty-nine. Leo XIII, as is well known, was keenly interested in raising the status of the Indian Clergy, and it is believed that it was at his suggestion that Monsignor Dalgado decided to return to India and devote his future labours to his own country. Looking to the contributions he has made to Oriental studies, one feels disposed, at this date, to regard the Pontiff's advice as providential, in as much as the different offices Dr. Dalgado came to hold in various parts of India and in Ceylon brought him into contact with the idioms and cultures of different people, and enabled him to gather materials for the two enduring monuments he was to raise in after years.

From Rome he went to Lisbon where, by a Government order of the 19th November, 1884, he was nominated a missionary of the Crown, with India as his field of activities. He arrived in Goa in April 1885 and in quick succession was appointed to several ecclesiastical offices. We shall refer here only to such as have a direct bearing on his researches in the field of Oriental studies.

On the 19th March, 1886, he was appointed Vicar General of Ceylon, and took charge of his office on the 14th May. As the result of a Concordat between the Holy See and the Portuguese sovereign, the Portuguese Mission in Ceylon became extinct on the 2nd January, 1887, and Dr. Dalgado returned to Goa, but not before he had acquired a working knowledge of Sinhalese and Malay. From May 1887 to April 1890, he was the Vicar General of Bengal, with his headquarters in Calcutta, long enough for him to acquire proficiency in Hindustani and Bengali. In 1893 he was appointed Vicar Forane of Honawar, and he continued in this office till 1895, employing his leisure in learning Kanarese and Tamil. A large part of the three years preceding his taking up his office at Honawar he spent at Savant-wadi, a State on the frontiers of Goa, with his eldest brother, Dr. Gelasio D. Dalgado, who was the Civil Surgeon there, studying Marathi and Sanskrit. It was evidently during these years and studies that he realised how closely his own mother tongue, Konkani, was related to Sanskrit, and the recognition of this fact led him to undertake a scientific investigation of the structure and vocabulary of this vernacular. Research was fruitful in helping him to bring out his Konkani-Portuguese Dictionary in 1893, and to write a Grammar of Konkani, on which he was busy at the time of his death and which in its manuscript form he bequeathed to the Public Library of Nova-Goa.

The dictionary has been compiled on a very systematic and scientific basis, the Konkani words being printed in Devanagari characters, and contains an introduction which is as informative as it is lucid. This work which had been executed on a scale and with a method never till then adopted, attracted the attention of the Portuguese authorities in Lisbon, who by an order of the 11th November, 1895, entrusted him with the task of bringing out a Portuguese-Konkani Dictionary, the cost of which was to be defrayed by the State. He had now to proceed to Lisbon to supervise the printing of this work, which ran into over nine hundred pages and dealt with vocables in an orthography with which the compositors at the Government Press were utterly unfamiliar. In the same year 1895, he was elected a fellow of the Geographical Society, Lisbon. The Dictionary came out in 1905 and about this time Dr. Dalgado was made a Domestic Prelate to the Pope. The Lisbon Government exempted him from further missionary service in the East. Such leisure as the exacting task of bringing out the Dictionary left him, he had devoted to the study of Sanskrit and Philology, under Oriental scholars in Portugal, in acquiring a working knowledge of German, and just that much of Arabic as would enable him to consult dictionaries of that language and of Persian. In 1907 he was appointed Professor of Sanskrit at the Lisbon University; and four years later he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences, Lisbon. In 1917 the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature was conferred upon him by the Lisbon University.

From the time he brought out his Dictionaries his literary output was prodigious, and his title to be numbered among the eminent philologists of the day grew with every new publication of his that issued from the press. Exclusive of articles he wrote on religious, historical and political subjects for journals in Portugal, Brazil and India, we give below a list of his published writings :

As will be noticed from the above, his special subject of study was the influence of Portuguese on the languages of the East, and inversely of the idioms of the East upon Portuguese, one might say European, vocabulary. No one before him had attempted this investigation on such a scale, and it can be safely asserted that not one who had touched upon this vast and absorbingly interesting field of study had brought to it the first-hand knowledge and intimacy with so many languages of the East and the West which he did. It was the Vocabulario which laid the foundation of his great reputation in the European world of Oriental studies. It represented twenty years' strenuous labours to track down the numerous Portuguese vocables which like nondescripts, without papers or passport, had strayed into the boundaries of Eastern idioms, and so many of whom had lost every semblance which might bespeak their country of origin.

But his chef d'œuvre is the Glossario Luso-Asiatico in two volumes. It is the complement to the Vocabulario and in it the author traces the history of the innumerable Eastern terms met with in Portuguese chronicles, very many of which have become naturalised in Portuguese, and not a few after crossing the frontiers of this language have secured domicile in other European tongues. In the introduction to it he mentions that his original intention was to include in it words derived from African sources, but partly because of the difficulty of obtaining accurate information regarding many of them, and chiefly because of the state of his health, he thought it prudent to circumscribe his investigations to Asia, for fear that the enterprise, as he phrases it, might get shipwrecked before reaching port. Even as it is, to use the words of Sir George Grierson, 'it is a monument of erudition'.

The Glossario is not only a Portuguese Hobson-Jobson but, as has been fitly pointed out by the late Mr. Longworth Dames, something more besides, because of the peculiar position which the Portuguese language occupies in its relation to the East, a relation very different from that of other European languages. The Portuguese were the first to give new terms and likewise the first to borrow new terms from the East: quite a large number of these latter were adopted by the French and the English.

It is possible to realise the magnitude and the monumental character of the work, embodying as it does the result of a quarter century's reading and research, by turning to the Bibliography. Its five hundred and more names of works—several of them running into many volumes—cover practically every book in Portuguese dealing with the East, a very large number of such in Latin, French, Italian, Dutch, Spanish and English, and some even from Arabic, Persian and Chinese sources.

Upon the appearance of the Glossario the author was overwhelmed with appreciations from Oriental scholars in different parts of the world. In England, Mr. Longworth Dames, the then Vice-President of the Royal Asiatic Society, reviewed it in the Society's Journal (April 1921) and went so far as to say that he hoped students in England and India who were not acquainted with Portuguese, would endeavour to obtain a sufficient knowledge of that language to enable them to avail themselves of the mass of invaluable information contained in the two volumes. Not long after he was elected an Honorary member of the Royal Asiatic Society.

But his great aspiration was to be a full member or, to use the Portuguese term, 'Socio efectivo' of the Lisbon Academy of Sciences, under whose auspices and at whose cost most of his important books had been published. The number of the 'Socios Effectivos', as of the 'Immortels' of the French Academy, is limited, but the death of one of them, Dr. Anselm Jose' Braacamp, had created a vacancy and Dr. Dalgado's name was selected to be placed before the general body at a session on the 27th April, but Providence had willed otherwise, for on the 4th of the same month Dr. Dalgado was summoned by his Maker to receive the due reward of his exemplary sanctity of life, untiring industry, wise use of his rare gifts and his heroic resignation in suffering.

The Portuguese people mourned the passing away of this Indian scholar as a national loss, for they had come to look upon his Vocabulario and the Glossario as imperishable monuments to their great and glorious past.

At the time of his death he had in the press the Florilégio de Provérbios Concanis. It is a fascinating and penetrating study of the everyday philosophy of the Konkani-speaking people. Two thousand one hundred and twenty-seven proverbs which he was able to collect have been translated into Portuguese and grouped under two hundred and twenty-three heads, commented upon and compared with similar sayings in different Asiatic (principally Sanskrit, Marathi, Kanarese) and European (Latin, English, French, Spanish, German) languages.

Early in 1922 he was engaged in preparing at the request of the Lisbon University, a new edition of Duarte Barbosa's famous 'Livro', but this and a grammar of the Konkani language at which he had been working from 1920 remained unfinished.

Apart from his sacred ministry, love for India and love for Portugal were the two consuming passions of his life. It is in connection with these that his literary activities had their being and around them they moved. The titles of his writings show how he distributed his interest almost equally between these two. But India, as is natural, occupied the first place in his affections. And it is a coincidence, at once significant and arresting, that he should have made his entry on the stage of Oriental scholarship with a dictionary of the Konkani language and that, when the curtain was rung down on his activities, he should have been engaged on an Anthology of Konkani proverbs and a Grammar of Konkani.

From his exiguous resources he endowed a prize for Sanskrit at the Lyceum in Goa, and offered to the Archbishop of Goa a sum of money for the foundation of a chair of Konkani in the seminary of Rachol. The Archbishop did not see his way to accept the offer and he felt disappointed. The Portuguese ecclesiastical authorities, in the past, have been no friends of Konkani, the people's tongue in Goa. Time and again they made relentless efforts to suppress the language of the soil, not unlike those once made by the Normans against Anglo-Saxon speech, and as unsuccessfully. Monsignor Dalgado was surely acquainted with these, but he must have presumed that a newer order had yielded place to the older one.

His intense devotion to India is understandable, but how is it that this Indian with not a trace of Portuguese blood in his veins came to feel the affection he did for Portugal? A sentence in his preface to this work bears witness to its intensity. 'I have pursued this task with an ardent zeal and unflagging enthusiasm inspired above all by my devotion to Portugal and thought for her glory.' We shall allow Dr. Dalgado himself to answer what on the surface appears to be a very intriguing query:—

"The influence of Portugal in the East which many foreign and some Portuguese writers have characterised as cruel, intolerant and of few beneficial results, presents nevertheless on careful investigation, an aspect and a type which are wholly peculiar, in as much as it has been highly sympathetic and warm-hearted. It is an influence which other nations who regard themselves as being more civilised and more liberal have not up to this day succeeded in exerting in spite of present-day advance in social doctrines. The most striking evidence of this influence, which in itself constitutes a glorious record of the relations that have existed between the conquerors and the conquered, is their effective and legal recognition of political and social equality, without any difference whatsoever, between the Portuguese and their colonials, be they Indians, Chinese, Oceanians or Africans—a policy which as yet remains a desideratum among non-Portuguese colonies, however rich, extensive and cultured.

According to the general theory of the Portuguese, their colonies are not dependencies or centres for exploitation. On the contrary, they are patches of Portugal sown, for her glory, in different climes with races, colours, castes, usages and customs, it is true, very unlike those of the mother country, but not on that account less Portuguese at heart and soul. It is on this account that a Portuguese born in India or Africa of European parents is not ashamed to call himself an Indian or an African.

This fact ought not to cause surprise or be looked upon as an isolated incident or one of recent happening. The primary and most absorbing motive force which impelled the early explorers and conquerors was the idea of extending the temporal and spiritual limits of Portugal and to bind the East and the West with the tender ties of love. Here is an instance of very great value in proof of this. The King of Portugal did not disdain to be treated by the friendly Rajas of Malabar as their brother and the Rajas very naturally were proud to be allowed to claim this relationship. It is useful to remember that no other sovereign of any other power has similarly treated any potentate, Asian or African, even up to the present day, when we are living in an age in which so much is talked about the liberty, equality and fraternity of the human race. Moreover, there is no record of any governor or viceroy of any other power having spoken of an Indian woman as 'my daughter' as the great Affonso Albuquerque used to do without distinction, in respect of the women of Goa, when they were coming over to Christianity and marrying his soldiers and sailors.

These and other facts of a similar nature furnish abundant proof that the Portuguese, who knew how to make themselves dreaded by their enemies and to treat them with severity, possessed, at the same time, the gift of associating themselves without any reserve with the indigenous population and of even identifying themselves with them, and if the latter happened also to belong to their faith, they were looked upon on that very account as their brothers."

It is much to be regretted that since the above was written, and during the last few years, there has been a backward movement in the old Portuguese colonial policy.

The equalitarian and fusionist doctrine of the Portuguese has by many been looked upon as the cause of their failure in the East ; there are others, however, who believe, and Dr. Dalgado is one of them, that the true criterion of estimating the success of colonial administration is the affectionate memory and grateful esteem of the rulers by the subject population and, tested by this, the success of the old Portuguese colonial policy has been very great indeed.

It is the earnest desire of present-day statesmanship to see the East and the West understand each other and to have them extend to each other the hand of fraternal sympathy. Dr. Dalgado's Vocabulario and Glossario will remain abiding monuments of such an alliance between the two civilisations, and he himself, whether regarded as man, priest, or scholar is a splendid exemplar of the happy result to be derived from an intimate association of the East and the West.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE

Authorities of indisputable competence have more than once recognised and not less often held forth the great advantage and importance of assembling in one place the large number of Portuguese words, many of them in everyday use, which have been taken over by most of the cultured and some also by the less advanced languages of Southern Asia.

It is now about twenty years that a daily paper in Bombay which has a vast circulation, The Times of India, suggested the importance of such a work with reference to India and pointed out to the late Dr. Gerson da Cunha as one suited for carrying it out.

Subsequently Dr. Hugo Schuchardt, an authority on the Romance languages of universal fame who has published so many works on the Portuguese dialects of Asia and Africa and on the diffusion of Portuguese in the East was insistent on the advantage and necessity of preparing a glossary of the Portuguese words introduced into Asiatic tongues.

Dr. Adolfo Coelho, in appreciating an interesting monograph of Mr. Gonçalves Viana on the influence of Portuguese on Malay, declared that this publication imposed upon him the obligation of completing the work he had begun by examining other languages of the Archipelago, a task which, most certainly, he had the competence to perform. But the eminent linguist, in a subsequent edition of his work referred to above, wrote to say that he did not deem himself qualified for undertaking the work and that one already had taken upon himself to execute it, thereby referring to the author of the present book.

Five and twenty years ago when I began the study of the sematology and the etymology of Konkani, the language of Goa, with the aid of dictionaries in Sanskrit, the parent tongue, and of the other languages in use on the frontiers of Goa, I noticed at once that it was not only in Portuguese India but also in British India that many Portuguese words were current ; this fact I had on a previous occasion, though of course on a scale much smaller, observed when I was the vicar general and administrator of the Portuguese missions in Ceylon and Bengal. In my Konkani-Portuguese dictionary published in 1903, I indicated by initials placed before the respective word, the six or seven languages, Aryan or Dravidian which used them and which I then knew.

Accepting the suggestion of a friend, I sent him from India in 1892 a very short manuscript study to be put before the International Congress of Orientalists which was to have been held in Lisbon but eventually was not held there. It was a brief study consisting of two distinct parts of the Indo-Portuguese dialect of Ceylon, and of the Portuguese terms, grouped under certain heads, which had been introduced into half a dozen languages of India.

The Geographical Society of Lisbon published, as my contribution to the celebrations in honour of the fourth centenary of the discovery of the sea-route to India, an enlarged study of the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon. But I could not then accede to the pressing request of the late Luciano Cordeiro to put through the press the second part of my essay because I wished to extend the scope of this part of the work and, at greater leisure, to co-ordinate it in the best possible manner.

Since then I have carried on, with interruptions more or less protracted and occasionally with flagging zeal, the arduous task of going through, more than once, a large collection of dictionaries and vocabularies of some fifty languages, some of them voluminous, rare and costly ; of acquiring incomplete but published lists of words ; of obtaining fresh ones through the help of obliging friends scattered over India, and finally of casting anew the materials thus brought together. And all this has been done in the midst of constant physical sufferings, oftentimes of an excruciating nature, and of not a few moral smarts.

It is but natural that works of the nature of this, especially those taking in an area so extensive and so little surveyed before, are as a rule incomplete and imperfect and full of errors of various sorts, and I should not have even now been rash enough to issue to the public the fruits of my investigations, had it not been for an ever-growing presentiment that Death might come to meet me in the midst of my labours.

What stimulated me in the carrying out of this weary task was not so much my love for literary pursuits as my ardent affection for Portugal. Should the present work, perhaps the last literary product of my leisure hours, with all its shortcomings, contribute in some measure towards her glory, I shall hold myself abundantly repaid for my labour and expense.

I wish to leave recorded here my ever grateful thanks to the Academy of Sciences which gave a most generous welcome to my book and sanctioned its publication ; to Mr. Gonçalves Viana who pronounced an opinion on it which I feel was a great deal too complimentary, and who went through the greater part of it and made many judicious and useful suggestions ; to Mr. J. A. Dias Coelho of the Government Printing Press, who with very great interest revised the proofs twice over ; to Mr. Candido Augusto Nazareth, the manager of the press, who helped so greatly in seeing it being put through quickly and also to its effective get-up ; to the missionaries of the Portuguese Government working in the East who furnished me with Portuguese words in the local dialects, and finally to all those who in whatever way have helped me in the execution of this work.

THE AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION

I. The Influence of Portugal on the East

The influence of Portugal on the Orient both as regards its extension and intension has not hitherto, as a whole, been adequately appreciated.

Much has been written about the glorious achievements of her navigators and conquerors, and of the heroic deeds of her captains and governors. There are graphic descriptions of her extensive commercial relations, of her vast emporiums and of the fearful trials and the dazzling luxury of her sons in the colonies. Likewise, in the light of the present-day trend of thought, her policy of cruelty and intolerance and the excesses that flowed from her religious zeal have been the subject matter of severe criticism. And it has been generally held that this influence of Portugal on the East was circumscribed, superficial and ephemeral.

The truth, however, is that the civilizing influence of Portugal in her former dominions and the peoples she came into contact with was, in more senses than one, very extensive, very deep and very abiding. There exist even at the present day numerous and unmistakable vestiges of this influence, and there are irrefutable arguments ¹ to support this view.

Dr. Heyligers recognises 'that the influence which the Portuguese exercised in the Indian Archipelago'—and the same can be said of diverse other parts—'was of an absolutely singular character,' and he includes it under three heads: population and race, customs, and language.¹ But there are other aspects by no means of less consequence and which, at the same time, are important factors of civilisation : the introduction of new objects, the flora, the fauna, agriculture and industries.

There is no colonial nation which has less racial egotism and is more inclined to identify itself with the indigenous population than the Portuguese.² The discerning mind of Albuquerque found no better means of knitting together the East and the West and of consolidating the Empire which he was founding than by the fusion of the conquerors and the conquered, and towards this end he concentrated all his efforts.³ If his judicious policy was not resolutely maintained or if it encountered grave difficulties, it did not fail any the less to achieve considerable results. Even at the present time there are to be met with in various parts of Asia groups of families, some small others large, which pride themselves on being the descendants of the European people who were the earliest in modern times to bring their civilisation to the East. These families also glory in designating themselves Portuguese and are proud of their Lusitanian patro-

'And already at this time there were in Goa four hundred and fifty married men, all servants of His Majesty, the King, and of the Queen, and of the Lords of Portugal; and those who wished to marry were so numerous that Afonso de Albuquerque could hardly grant their requests, for he did not give permission except for the men of proved character to marry.' Commentaries of Afonso Albuquerque, III, Ch. 9. [Hak. Soc., Vol. III, p. 41.—Ed.]

'The Portuguese make a marvellous profit all over India. Where they are well received they associate with the natives of the country, who in their turn accompany them in their voyages, so much so, that even all the crews of their ships and pilots are Indians, either Mohammedans or Hindus.' nymies. On this very account they sometimes enjoy rights and privileges which are superior to those granted to the indigenous classes or are the same as those enjoyed by the Europeans as is the case in the Moluccas.¹

Uptil now we know of no means more effective for civilizing backward peoples than Christianity and its missionary activities ; and all colonial nations in greater or less degree employ and support these agencies. The Portuguese colonisers in preference to all other methods made use of religious propaganda as the most effective and enduring way of introducing their culture.² And if there were some resultant abuses now exaggerated by hypercritics, the converts to Christianity are not prepared to admit that they owe more to Europe than to the religion which they

'In Cochin I came across a primary school where children are taught, and I thought that Your Highness would not allow the children to rot now that they are in the school, and I, therefore, gave orders that one of the men who had contracted marriage here should teach the children to read and write ; there will be an attendance at the school of nearly one hundred youths and they are the children of the panikars (teachers) and other honest men ; the youths are very sharp and take in what is taught them, and that very quickly, and they are all Christians.' profess. And as these converts recall to mind with gratitude the names of those who were the earliest to bring over to them their faith, with ample good will they forgive the Portuguese nation for the lapses they may well have been guilty of.¹ And among the cultured Hindus, who are championing the cause of national self-rule, there are not wanting some who regret, as I myself have had occasion to hear, that Portugal had not converted to her religion the greater part of India.

The Portuguese also promoted the civilisation of the East by her immense trade, bringing over from Europe objects unknown in these parts, introducing these into the domestic life of the people, and by carrying very many objects from parts of Asia to others more remote in the continent; this last fact is testified to by the names of the articles with which are associated their place of origin.²

The flora of Asia and, in a especial degree, that of India owes to Portugal the introduction of very many plants, most of

'These Catholic populations, which even now are to be found there, in lands over which for long years we have lost our sway, and which combine with reverence for their faith their regard for the name of our land (Portugal), go to prove how deep the teaching and the influence of the Portuguese missionary had penetrated.' them of American origin, many of which now grow wild, cover extensive areas and are of conspicuous utility.¹

In like manner the fauna of the East was enriched, thanks to the Portuguese, by the addition of many specimens till then unknown or not at all common. Proof in support of this will be found in the course of this work.

The cultivation of fields and cocoanut plantations owed no little improvement to the Portuguese and especially to their religious orders who owned extensive but at the same time model estates.² And the same may be said with regard to other branches of industry.

II. The Influence of the Portuguese Language

The influence which the Portuguese language exercised in the past and even to this day exercises over a large part of Asia, more than any other factor, establishes the great value of the civilizing rôle of Portugal, so wholly singular and without a parallel. That the language of the conquering people will become the official language of a country is to be expected and, as a matter of course, the indigenous inhabitants find themselves under the necessity of learning to speak and write it. But this condition of affairs lasts only so long as the country is under the yoke of the foreigner. Thus we see that Holland, which exercised dominion over various parts of India has left scarcely any trace of its speech unless it be a word or two in one language or another.

It is likewise to be expected that the descendants of the once dominant nation will continue to employ, especially should they represent a large body, their mother tongue long time after their national sovereignty has passed away. This is the case with the Portuguese in Bengal, on both the coasts of the Indian peninsula, and in Malacca and Singapore.

But the phenomenon which one notices in Ceylon is nothing short of a marvel. There, not only the descendants of the Portuguese, but even the children of the Hollanders who exercised a sway over the island during as long a period as the Portuguese, and generally speaking all the Euro-Asiatics and even some of the indigenous inhabitants, have adopted Portuguese as their mother tongue. Besides these, there are the Europeans and the natives who learn the language for the convenience of trade, domestic requirements, or religious services.¹

And it is yet again a matter for surprise and not a little amazing, that a section of the indigenous population, which cannot lay claim to a drop of Portuguese blood in its veins, should have repudiated its own vernacular and adopted, together with the Christian religion, Portuguese as its mother tongue. This is a phenomenon which one notices in the Presidency of Bombay and also in some parts of the Malabar Coast.²

The expansion of the Portuguese language over Asia during the past centuries is astounding. 'The history of the discovery of the Portuguese conquests is likewise the history, generally speaking, of the spread of the Portuguese language,'³ says Dr. Schuchardt very aptly, and he establishes his thesis with much erudition. To this may be added that the history of the spread of Portuguese missionary activities is, in an equal measure, up to a certain point, the history of the diffusion of the Portuguese language. In those early days Portuguese was regarded as the language of Christianity par excellence and a knowledge of it was looked upon as an index of European culture.¹

1 'Already the language of the Dutch, which they sought to extend by penal enactments, has ceased to be spoken even by their direct descendants, whilst a corrupted Portuguese is to the present day the vernacular of the lower classes in every town of importance.' Emerson Tennent.

Portuguese was spoken in its pure or corrupt form throughout the whole of India, in Malaysia, Pegu, Burma, Siam, Tonquin, Cochín-China, China, in Kamaran in Persia, in Basra of the Turkish Vilayet, and in Mecca in Arabia.² And it was spoken not only by the Portuguese and their descendants but by Hindus, Mahomedans, Jews, Malays, and by Europeans of other nationalities in their intercourse with one another or with the indigenous people. It was employed by the Dutch missionaries in their own dominions and, even to this day, English Protestant ministers make use of it in Ceylon. It was therefore for a long time the lingua franca of the East.³

'Taken, for certain, to India from the Dominican mission of Larentuka, in the neighbouring island of Flores—from this Larentuka where even to-day Catholic prayers are recited in Portuguese.' Dr. Alberto de Castro, Flores de Joral, pp. 147-148.

² 'The Portuguese language is spoken and is current from Gujarat to Cape Comorin. It is not unknown on the Coromandel Coast as far as Bengal. It is in common use, in a form more or less pure, in Ceylon, in the Malay Archipelago, and in China. It is understood in Siam and in various groups of the Oceanic Archipelagos, etc.' Cunha Rivara, Grammatica da Língua Concani (Grammar of the Konkani Language).

³ 'Indo-Portuguese is more or less understood by all classes in the island of Ceylon and all along the whole coast of India; the extreme simplicity of its construction and the facility with which it can be acquired has brought about its extensive use as a medium of intercourse.' The Bible of Every Land. See Introduction to Hobson-Jobson, and the learned articles of Dr. Adolfo Coelho, published in the Journal of the Geographical Society of Lisbon (2nd, 3rd, and 6th series) under the title Dialectos Romanicos; also the same Journal (2nd series, p. 133) with regard to the expansion of Portuguese in Southern Africa. [See also A. X. Soares, The Portuguese Heritage to the East (Journal Bombay Branch R.A.S., No. LXXIV, Vol. XXVI).—ED.]

It is true that to-day the radius of the circulation of Portuguese in Asia is no longer what it used to be; it is much reduced. It has ceased to be the lingua franca, and, of its several dialects, some are extinct, others are in articulo mortis, and it may well be that yet others shall, after the lapse of ages, have entirely disappeared. But when perchance Portuguese shall have ceased to be spoken in the East, the words from the beautiful tongue of Camoens, adopted and naturalised in a hundred and one of the vernaculars of the East, will continue to exist as long as the vernaculars themselves endure and stand as living and abiding monuments of the Portuguese dominion and civilisation in those parts.

As was to be expected, the languages which most felt the influence of Portuguese were those of India and the Eastern Archipelago. And these are precisely the languages which are the subject of this study, and to these for one reason or another are superadded others. It is on this account that the philological notes that follow in the succeeding chapters have most reference to India.

III. The Languages of India. General Observations

India, on a par with her other riches, is rich also in languages and dialects of various species and gradations, which are spoken by an indigenous population of over 300 millions in an area which is equal to that of half Europe.¹

Especially in the mountainous tracts inhabited by numerous tribes, nomadic and savage or semi-savage there exist so many diverse forms of speech that it is difficult to say whether they are distinct languages, well-defined dialects, or mere variants. In the plains the more important languages spread themselves out as the result of a process of absorption, and many dialects ordinarily limited to provinces or districts are easily reduced to one common type. But there are cities like Bombay and Calcutta which are veritable Babels, where not infrequently one comes across people who can speak, without much difficulty, two or three languages, and educated persons who can express themselves correctly in half a dozen tongues.

But the scientific exploration and the comparative study of this vast language-field may well be said to be yet in its embryonic stage, notwithstanding the valuable investigations on general or special lines which during the last years have seen the light of day thanks to Erskine Perry, John Wilson, Max Müller, George Campbell, Crawford, Marsden, Hoernle, Caldwell, Latham, Burnell, Beames, Cust, Grierson, and other eminent orientalists.¹

Scholars who were absorbed during a long period in the study of the Sanskrit language and its literature, either did not find the time for an analysis of the vernaculars, or perhaps did not deem them worthy of their attention. The early missionaries, as a rule, used to learn the common speech of their zone only so far as was necessary for their work of preaching the Gospel. If they managed to write anything for the use of the public it was no more than what was necessary for teaching religious doctrine to catechumens and neophytes.² Even thus, the earliest writings in connection with the languages of the East have come exclusively from the preachers of the Gospel, and in modern times the cultivation of these languages is principally their work.¹

² It is but natural that the more proficient should leave behind hand-written notes, grammatical and lexicographical, for the private use of their colleagues and successors in office. 'Father Francisco Anriquez learnt to speak the language and even read and write the script of the country (Malabar) in six months, and within a short time brought out a grammar and a glossary of the language, to the astonishment of the native population and to the great advantage of our Fathers and Lay Brothers who, since then till now, thanks to these and other books which were being produced, study the Malabar language with the same ease with which they do Latin.' Rev. João Lucena, Historia da Vida do Padre Francisco de Xavier, Bk. V, Ch. 25.

Since the last fifty years and especially during very recent years the study and the cultivation of the more important living languages has grown apace thanks to the persistent efforts of missionaries and indologists and to the sustained stimulus and generous patronage of the British Government. Everywhere there are to be found mixed vernacular schools, and every year there is published a large number of books in the characters of the various vernaculars, most of them of a didactic nature, not to speak of the large number of periodicals and journals which are read with great avidity by the present generation.²

It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that up to now there has been no investigation on scientific lines of the total number of languages and dialects in India nor has there been a unanimous consensus of opinion regarding the limits of the Indian language-field which, of course, varies a great deal from the geographical and political boundaries of India. Robert Cust enumerates no less than two hundred and forty-three languages and two hundred and ninety-six of the dialects grouped under eight families; but he unduly extends the range of the language-field including in it Timor, Madagascar, and the island of Formosa, owing, as he says, to linguistic and ethnic affinities.³

languages with many of their principal dialects, omitting some and designating others under generic heads.¹

Sir George Grierson in a more recent publication based upon the British Indian census of 1901, to which he contributed a chapter on the languages of India, computes the total number to be one hundred and forty-seven, including therein the two spoken in Aden (Semitic and Hamitic) and excluding therefrom those of Ceylon (Sinhalese and the language of the Veddas, the aborigines of the island) and of the temporary sojourners in the country. From among the Malayan group of languages he includes only two (Selung and Nicobarese) and he makes Konkani a dialect of Marathi.²

IV. Classification and Division of Languages

The vernaculars of India and of the Indian Archipelago, actually spoken, can be grouped under five principal families: Aryan (Indic and Iranian branches), Dravidian, Munda or Kolarian, Indo-Chinese (with three sub-families: Mon-Khmer, Tibeto-Burman, Siamo-Chinese), and Malayo-Polynesian.³

The Iranian branch has its representatives in Pushtu or Pakhtu and in Baluchi, in the north of India.

The Indic branch includes the Indo-Aryan or Gaurian languages, which stand in the same relation to classical Sanskrit as the Romance languages do to classical Latin.⁴ Such are:

² George Grierson, The Languages of India, and the Census of 1901, in The Asiatic Society Quarterly Review, April, 1904. See also Linguistic Survey of India, by the same author.

Hindi, Punjabi, Sindhi, Bihari, Bengali, Marathi, Konkani, Gujarati, Assamese, Oriya, Kashmiri, Nepali, Sinhalese.¹ Sir Grierson adds to these eleven others which he designates as Aryan but non-Sanskritic and these are spoken in Gilgit, Chitral, and Kafiristan. The total population of those who speak the Aryan tongues is more than 220 millions.²

To the Dravidian family belong Tamil, Malayalam, Telugu, Kanarese, Tulu, Kodagu; Toda, Kota, Kurukh (or Uraon), Malhar (or Rajmahali); Gond, Khond; Kandh, Kolami. The first five and perhaps the Kodagu are cultivated; the rest are not cultivated. The population that employs the Dravidian languages is more than 57 millions.³

parative Dictionary of the Bihari Language, Introduction. But it is necessary to make a distinction: Sanskrit properly so called or classic Sanskrit could not have been a mother tongue, learnt at the breast of the mother, but yet it is undeniable, according to the data provided by Yaska, Panini, and Patanjali that it was spoken by the cultured classes throughout the length and breadth of Ariavarta (from the Himalayas to the Vindhyas), in the same way as Portuguese is in Goa. See Arthur Macdonell, A History of Sanskrit Literature. And it is to be noted that in the census of 1901, seven hundred and sixteen individuals declared Sanskrit to be their language.

Sanskrit was evolved from the dialect spoken on the banks of the Sarasvati river almost in the same way as Latin was from the Italian dialect of Latium. Bālabhāshā (literally 'the language of children') corresponds to Low Latin which was spoken by the masses. In many of the Indian languages, inclusive of the Dravidian, the literary idiom differs much from the spoken, as must also have happened, though perhaps not to the same extent, with Latin and Greek. Vid. Robert Caldwell, A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Languages.

¹ With respect to the classification of this language, there is a difference of opinion among indologists and to this we will refer hereafter.

The third family—Kolarian—has its original home in the mountainous regions of Western Bengal, and contains ten distinct members, among which are the Santali and the Kol, spoken by 3 millions. The sub-family Mon-Khmer of the Indo-Chinese branch is, at the present day, represented in India by Khassi in Assam, and by Palaung and Wa in the mountains of Upper Burma, and outside India by the languages of Pegu and Cambodia.

Tibetan and Burmese are the two cultivated languages which belong to the other sub-family of the Indo-Chinese branch; they have in the mountainous regions of Northern India innumerable members, most of them little known, and some of them classified in groups, like : Garo, Bodo, Naga, Kuki-chin, Kachin, Himalayan. The Nevari and other dialects of Nepal with the exception of Nepalese are related to Tibetan.

The third sub-family which, outside China, has its principal home in Siam is represented in India by the language of the Shan States and of the Karens of Southern Burma.

Finally the fifth family—Malayan or Malayo-Polynesian—takes in Malacca and Malaysia. Cust makes out ten groups : the Sumatra-Malacca, Java, Celebes, Borneo, Philippines, Molucca, Timor, China, Madagascar and the Alfuresse-Negrito group—and enumerates eighty-eight languages and twenty-nine dialects.

With this genealogical classification agrees more or less the morphological. The Indo-Aryan languages are polysyllabic and inflectional, some of them with a tendency towards the analytic stage. The Dravidian are polysyllabic, agglutinative, prone to the use of suffixes, and with a tendency towards a certain degree of inflection. The Kolarian are polysyllabic, agglutinative, suffixive and infixative like the Turkish. The Indo-Chinese languages are monosyllabic and agglutinative. The Malayo-Polynesian are agglutinative but dissyllabic.¹

Sanskrit writers used to designate the languages of Southern India andhradrāvi-dabhāshā, 'the language of the Andhras and the Dravidas.'

V. Geographical Distribution

It is evident that in the present state of our knowledge, which is far from complete, it is not possible to trace with mathematical accuracy the lines which divide each of the living languages of India, nor would this be possible in respect of certain localities.

Apart from the difficulty referred to above, of determining the territorial boundaries of the languages of India, there arises another of ascertaining whether the hill peoples who are ethnically distinct are also separated by language differences, and if their languages belong to one and the same family.¹

There are countries where two or more mother tongues or vernaculars exist side by side spoken by different tribes or races ; this phenomenon is due to immigration in the remote past.

Besides this, two or more languages become so blended along the frontier of a continuous stretch of territory that, they either go to form one separate dialect with elements taken equally from each language and without any genealogical subordination or one of the two rises superior to the other and preserves its ties of family likeness.

It is not to be expected, therefore, that the linguistic maps which have till now been published are accurate in respect of all the languages ; some of them err through excess—by double designation or enlargement of the language-field—others through defect—by omission or contraction of the language area.

The zone of each of the more important languages is sufficiently well known in its general lines and will be marked out in the description that follows of each of these.

¹ 'In the Himalayas the two families, as far as we have data for them, are so intermixed, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down definite boundaries. . . . Especially is this the case in the large kingdom of Nepal which is still a terra incognita in many respects.' Beames, Outlines of Indian Philology, p. 9.

The linguistic map that is annexed to this work is an adaptation of the one worked out by Cust, with certain modifications, which I have found very necessary.

VI. The Scope of this Study

This work treats of :

1. The Aryan Family, (a) Indic branch : Konkani, Marathi, Gujarati, Hindi, Hindustani, Laskari-Hindustani, Nepali, Oriya, Bengali, Assamese, Sindhi, Punjabi, Kashmiri and Sinhalese.—(b) Iranian branch : Modern Persian.
2. The Dravidian Family: Tamil, Malayalam, Telugu, Kanarese and Tulu.
3. The Indo-Chinese Family, (a) Tibeto-Burman branch : Garo, Burmese, and Tibetan.—(b) Mon-Khmer branch : Khasi and Kambojan.—(c) Siamo-Chinese branch : Siamese, Annamite and Tonkinese.
4. The Malayo-Polynesian Family: Malay, Achinese, Batta, Sundanese, Javanese, Madurese, Balinese, Dayak, Macassar, Bugui, Nicobarese, Teto, Galoli and Malagasy.
5. The Semitic Family: Eastern Arabic.
6. Japanese, without any classification.
7. Anglo-Indian and Indo-French.
8. Anglo-Chinese or Pidgin-English.
9. Mediatly: Some languages of the Malayo-Polynesian family and other origins.

I did not extend the scope of my treatise further than this because I had no materials on hand for doing so and because I did not wish to protract its publication indefinitely. The languages which have not been included in this survey are of very little importance and very little influenced by Portuguese.

VII. Exotic Elements

No Asiatic language, generally speaking, and no Indian language in particular, can pride itself on possessing a vocabulary which is purely vernacular, free from a very considerable and, at the same time very necessary admixture indeed, of heterogeneous elements.¹ The exotic elements were first introduced by Sanskrit, whose influence direct or indirect on the Dravidian languages (and on a smaller scale on the Malayan languages) is comparable to that which Latin continues to exercise on the non-Romance languages of Europe. It is divided into old Sanskrit which is in common use and the modern which is confined to literary purposes.

The Mahommedan invasion, in its turn, brought into the country many Arabic and Persian terms but these enriched the vocabularies more of the Aryan than of the Dravidian languages : its influence on these was similar to what it exercised on the languages in the peninsula of Spain.

After them the Portuguese, as was to be expected, gave a large number of words of their own language to almost all the languages, cultivated or uncultivated, what time they themselves were absorbing a large number of words from them into their own tongue. This they effected by direct or indirect means, and they also helped to spread over the country some vernacular expressions derived from one or the other language after they had undergone sometimes a phonetic modification at their hands.

The Dutch, as has been said before, have left very few vestiges of their language and these almost exclusively in Sinhalese; nor, in spite of their long domination, is the influence of their language very great in the languages of Malay, as is admitted by Dr. Fokker.

Finally, English is at present exercising an influence analogous to that of the Portuguese language, especially in the administrative and commercial terminology, in all the lands subject to its sway. And in course of time this influence will grow more extensive even as the knowledge of the English tongue spreads more among the people.

VIII. The Agencies at Work and Grounds for the Influence of Portuguese on Asiatic Languages

The introduction of Portuguese words into Asiatic languages has been effected through agencies which have been working either separately or simultaneously :—

- (a) direct dominion
- (b) commercial connection
- (c) political influence
- (d) vicinage of Portuguese colonies
- (e) religious propaganda
- (f) consociation of many vernaculars in certain cities
- (g) borrowings from a contiguous language or from a more important language which had already been influenced
- (h) co-existence of Indo-Portuguese
- (i) Anglo-Indian vocabulary

The influence of Portuguese and its range is determined by the nature of the cause or combination of causes, and the degree of its action and extent. There are terms in common use which are to be met with in all or almost all the indigenous cultivated languages, and the number of such is small ; there are others which are exclusively used by Christians ; again there are some which are known to the educated classes and used only in the principal cities.

The directions in which this influence was most felt, and the chief reasons that led to its operation, may be brought under the following heads :—

1. The Christian religion which was propagated and carried on by Portuguese missionaries or by missionaries who though not Portuguese had assimilated Portuguese ways of life and thought ; this was so because there were no vernacular terms corresponding exactly with what they wished to teach, or such as were known to the people at large. Again, even when suitable terms or expressions existed in the indigenous languages, they made use of the Portuguese words for fear lest the people might confound Christianity with Hinduism or Mahomedanism and thereby trace resemblances between these three religions. Cf. cruz (cross), igreja (church), altar (altar), padre (priest), casar (to marry). Likewise the names of ecclesiastical dignitaries, of church vestments and vessels, of ceremonies and liturgical festivities are with few exceptions Portuguese, as: papa (Pope), bispo (bishop), arcebispo (archbishop), meirinho (beadle) ; cálix (chalice), hóstia, partícula (the sacred wafer) ; alva (alb), estola (stole), capa (cope) ; Natal (Christmas), Advento (Advent), Pascoa (Easter).¹
2. The new civilisation which introduced new vocables to signify objects till then unknown or little known, such as : armário (ward-robe), balde (bucket), bomba (pump), botão (button), camisa (shirt), fita (ribbon), pena (quill), pipa (barrel), pistola (pistol), meia (sock), cadeira (chair).

3. The introduction of new plants ; with them were naturally carried the names by which they were known in their places of origin, like : ananás (pine-apple), anona (bull's heart or the Anona reticulata), caju (Anacardium occidentale), couve (cabbage), papaia (Carica papaya), pera (guava or Psidium guyava), tabaco (tobacco).
4. Foreign words which are often regarded as better adapted to convey an air of distinction or superiority to persons or objects.¹ Cf. mestre (master), pedreiro (mason), louvado (expert, arbitrator), copo (cup), cozinha (kitchen), doce (sweet), pão (bread), jogo (game, play), tronco (lock-up).
5. Certain words which are adopted by preference because they are simple to pronounce, and are withal expressive and characteristic. Cf. ama (nurse), aia (ayah), bacia (plate), banco (bench), grade (railing), leilão (auction-sale), sorte (lottery).
6. Again, there are certain terms the adoption of which to the detriment of or in addition to the vernacular word can solely be explained by the fascination that certain vocables are capable of exercising. Cf. buraco (hole), chave (key), paga (salary), ponta (point or end), renda (tax).
7. We also come across some words of Asiatic origin which were introduced directly into the other languages from Indo-Portuguese, such as : achar

(pickle), chita (chintz), gudão (store-room), pires (saucer), rota (walking-stick).

IX. The Morphology of the Exotics

The greater number of the imported words is made up, as is natural, of substantives which are either the names of persons or objects, and of some abstract nouns, and these are employed sometimes in an extended and, at others, in a limited sense.

Abstract terms and derivatives are formed and the nouns declined in conformity with the general rules of each language. To take an instance, bebdó (drunkard), in Konkani, gives bebdepan or bebdikáy (drunkenness); bébaduva, in Sinhalese, gives bēbadukama. From kāzár, also used as a substantive in Konkani in the sense of 'marriage', is derived: kāzāri (married), kāzārātsó (marriageable), kāzró ('marriage' in a depreciative sense).

Some substantives are employed in an acceptation peculiar to the local Portuguese dialect as in the Sinhalese, rámuva (from the Port. dialect, ramo) for 'mould'; réndaya (from the Port. dialect, renda) for 'rent, 'toll, tax payable to the State'.

Verbs have very little adaptability and are never much in demand for borrowing purposes. And yet we meet many of them in Konkani and in the Malayan group. In Konkani they remain as a rule unchanged and are conjugated with the vernacular verb corresponding to 'to make' or 'to be' according as it is transitive or intransitive and reflexive. The Malay verbs have no inflexions.

Some words with a verbal form have, in addition or exclusively, the meaning of the substantive, as casar (to marry and marriage), pintar (to paint and a painting), jogar (game of dice), confessar (confession).

Some adjectives occur in a few languages, which are also used adverbially as the result of indigenous influence, as, in Goa, júst (just and justly), sert (certain and certainly). Adverbs proper, conjunctions and prepositions occur only in the Malay group. But we meet with contra (against) in Konkani.

X. Remarks on the Phonetics

Portuguese words in their transition to Oriental languages suffer as a rule phonetic changes which are more or less important ; the same is the case with Asiatic vocables which were introduced into Portuguese. Some of the changes are common to almost all languages and these are consequent on their passage from one language to another or on their obeying the same laws ; there are others which are peculiar to each language or to a group or family of languages.

This work being primarily intended for lexicographical purposes, it is not possible to analyse and explain in every case all the phonetic changes that so many words have gone through. On this I think, it would be useful to set down here, in general only the most important changes :

1. The initial vowel when it constitutes a syllable by itself is dropped in the case of polysyllabic words in the same way as in corrupt Portuguese dialects : Thus we have : kāphlár from 'acafelar' (to plaster), nánas from 'ananás' (pine-apple), nona from 'anona' (bull's heart or Anona reticulata) ; már, murá (L.-Hindust.) from 'amarra' (cable) ; girjá from 'igreja' (church) ; vānjel (Konk.) from 'evangelho' (evangel) ; būrnal (L.-Hindust.) from 'embornal' (scupper hole in a ship) ; duljens (Konk.) from 'indulgência' (indulgence) ; legojo (Jav.) from 'algoz' (executioner).
2. Sometimes the initial syllable when it begins with a consonant is likewise dropped, as in míngo or míngu (Mal., Jav.) from 'domingo' (Sunday) ; báko (in many of the Malayo-Polynesian languages) from 'tabaco' (tobacco) ; dílu (Mac.) from 'codilho' (a term employed in a game of cards) ; pinéti (Mal.) from 'alfinete' (pin).

3. The final vowel when preceded by a stressed vowel may also sometimes be dropped as in almāri from 'armário' (ward-robe); basí from 'bacia' (plate); in Konkani all the post-tonic vowels are eliminated; thus we have, ālmār from 'armário' (ward-robe); vigār from 'vigário' (vicar); muzg from música (music) and músico (musician); kámbr from 'câmara' (chamber).
4. The final a after a consonant is treated in diverse ways. In the Aryan languages of the South (except Sinhalese) it is silent as in phít from 'fita' (ribbon), kamís or kamij from 'camisa' (shirt), bomb from 'bomba' (pump). In those of the North, ordinarily, it is lengthened out or stressed as in phítá, pīpá, gīrjá, kamij, mēj from 'fita' (ribbon); 'pipa' (barrel); 'igreja' (church); 'camisa' (shirt); 'mesa' (table). In the Dravidian it is changed into u, a favourite termination with them: kamisu (Tam. kamisei), pistúlu, ripu, váru from 'camisa' (shirt), 'pistola' (pistol), 'ripa' (lath), 'vara' (yard). In the Malayan, the final a is retained in some words, whilst in others it is changed into the closed o: renda, rendó, from 'renda' (tax or hire), roda, rodó from 'roda' (wheel), ronda, rondó from 'ronda' (patrol).
5. The final e mute oscillates between the tonic i (Aryan languages) and the atonic i (Dravidian and Malayan languages): bāldí, báldi from 'balde' (bucket); chāví, chávi from 'chave' (key); pādrí, pádrí from 'padre' (priest). In Konkani and Marathi it is dropped many times, being preceded by the simple consonant: kóbb from 'couve' (cabbage); garád from 'grade' (railing); búl (Konk.) from 'bule' (tea-pot); kóch (Konk.) from 'coche' (coach).

6. Similarly, the final o is dropped in the Aryan languages ; it is changed into the short u in the Dravidian and into u short or the closed ó in the Malayan languages. Thus we have bánk, báńku, báńkó from 'banco' (bench); kald, káldu, káldó from 'caldo' (broth); burákh (Aryan) from 'buraco' (hole). But tambākú or tamākú from 'tabaco' (tobacco), in almost all languages.
7. The diphthongs ei and ou change into é or ê and ó, as in the Portuguese dialects. Thus we have bandér, bandéra, banderó from 'bandeira' (flag); kadér, kadera, kadêl from 'cadeira' (chair); kób, kóbis from 'couve,' pl. couves (cabbage); orívis (Mal.) from 'ourives' (goldsmith).
8. Some vowels in contact with the labial consonants become nasal: tambakú from 'tabaco' (tobacco), pimp from 'pipa' (barrel), bhomplá (Mar.) from 'abóbora' (pumpkin). Also phínt from 'fita' (ribbon).¹
9. Ch preserves its old sound which is current in the north of Portugal and identical with the oriental tch: tchepém from 'chapéu' (hat), tchinél from 'chinella' (slipper). In some languages as Konkani and Marathi it sounds like ts when followed by a and o. Thus, tsāví from 'chave' (key).
10. V is almost equivalent to the English w especially when it is a medial. Such languages as have no v (and sometimes also those that have it) convert it into b in the same manner as they change f into p.
11. The initial r is pronounced as though it were a medial. Double r's are changed into a single as a rule, because they are not to be met with in the majority of Asiatic languages ; e.g. we have kareta from 'carreta' (light cart), amáru from 'amarra' (cable), bora from 'bôrra' (wine lees), phôr from 'fôrro' (lining).

12. Lh and nh which have no sounds corresponding to them are rendered respectively by ly or l and ny or n. Thus we have tuváliya, tuvála, tuvál, tuvâlô from 'toalha' (towel); veillu, el, from 'velho' (old); kunyá from 'cunha' (wedge); barkín from 'barquinha' (a skiff). Konkani, Malayalam and some other languages preserve the original sound in some words representing it by ñ or ññ. Thus we get modiñ or modinh (Konk.) from 'modinha' (song), viññu (Malayal.) from 'vinho' (wine).
13. S intervocalic (=z) is generally changed into j (sometimes into s sibilant) either because many of the languages have no such sound or because it is only associated with the syllables of certain vowels (a, o, u, as in Konkani, Marathi, Sindhi). Thus we have mêj from 'mesa' (table), kamij or kamis from 'camisa' (shirt).¹
14. R and l change places in those languages which have these sounds but in those which have only one of them the one is replaced by the other. Thus we have kadêl, bhoblô from 'cadeira' (chair), and 'abóbora' (pumpkin); boru, charamera (Jap.) from 'bôlo' (cake), and 'charamela' (bagpipe); complador, patili (Pid.-Engl.) from 'comprador' (steward) and 'padre' (priest).
15. Surd consonants frequently become sonant, but rarely does the reverse of this happen. Thus we

- have alavángu from 'alavanca' (a hand-spike); turung from 'tronco' (lock-up); práda from 'prata' (silver); prek from 'prego' (nail).
16. Some consonants, especially when they are in contact with r, become cerebral as happens in Sanskrit. Thus we have soḍṭí, soṛṭí from 'sorte' (lottery); kornel from 'coronel' (colonel); bhobló, or bhomplá from 'abóbora' (pumpkin); barkín from 'barquinha' (a skiff).
 17. There are instances of aspirate consonants, as in khamís from 'camisa' (shirt); khurís from 'cruz' (cross); burákh from 'buraco' (hole); bhobló or bhomplá from 'abóbora' (pumpkin).
 18. There occurs a transposition of r, as in girjá from 'igreja' (church), krasa from 'garça' (heron).
 19. The hiatus in the middle of a word is destroyed by the intercalation of a v, as in tuvál or tuvâló from 'toalha' (towel), baluvárdi from 'baluarte' (bastion).
 20. When there are two consonants together and the second of them is an r, a separation is effected between them by the insertion of a vowel (suara-bacti): garád from 'grade' (railing); paránc from 'prancha' (scaffolding); karáb from 'cravo' (a pink); turung from 'tronco' (trunk); vidur, vidurava from 'vidro' (glass). Some of the languages do not admit of compound consonants at all; others admit of only double or twin consonants.

XI. Sources and Difficulties of such a Study

The most satisfactory way of compiling a complete list of the Portuguese words grafted on to the vocabularies of Asiatic languages, would naturally be to collect the terms by a living and intimate contact with all the different strata of each people, due regard being paid to every phase of their languages. Now, this is well nigh impossible in view of the enormous area and the immense variety of languages to be explored and investigated, not to speak of other obvious difficulties.

Even a seasoned polyglot would find it very difficult to be able to acquire, at the end of many years, complete personal knowledge of about half a dozen languages, and these of one or two language groups only. It is just on this account that there are as yet no comparative dictionaries just as there are comparative grammars of great value.¹ Such as exist are small vocabularies or dictionaries of some dialects or of two or three of cognate languages.²

Another way, supplementary but deficient withal, would be to obtain with the help of competent persons a list of Portuguese vocables that have found their way into their respective languages. This again is not easy, because there are few who would show any inclination for a task so thankless, involving the assembling of words which do not spontaneously present themselves to the mind when dissociated from any specific ideas. Even with the help of obliging friends it was not possible for me to secure more than three lists of Tamil, one of Bengali, one of Kanarese, and one of Telugu, and these too were incomplete and summary. I am not aware that such lists of Portuguese words have been made, incomplete though they be, excepting one relating to Hindustani (Schuchardt, op. cit.) and some others bearing upon the languages of the Malayo-Polynesian group.

Under these circumstances the only course to take was to run through, word by word, the dictionaries of such languages as possess them, and hunt them out. But very few are the living languages of Asia which like Marathi, Hindustani or Malay possess a dictionary which may be called a thesaurus linguae. The majority of them have been compiled for school or missionary purposes and some of them do not pretend to satisfy any but the elementary needs. It is, therefore, too much to expect that in such compilations will appear all the words in general or special use.¹

² In 1868 Sir W. W. Hunter published a list of 186 vocables in 120 non-Aryan languages or dialects under the title of Comparative Dictionary of the Languages of India and High Asia. F. A. Sevettenham likewise brought out his Comparative Vocabulary of the Dialects of the Wild Tribes inhabiting the Malayan Peninsula.

Dictionary-makers as a rule try to avoid foreign words (I am speaking from experience), perhaps because of a desire to show off the richness of the language, or, when they do mention them, interpret them by descriptions with which the spoken language will have nothing to do. When they point out the etymology of a word, and, there are very few who attempt this, as the greater number of them are not acquainted with Portuguese, they follow the usual tradition and attribute it to a source to which it does not really belong or on the other hand, evade the difficulty by referring it to one of the indigenous languages.²

In some cases there are great difficulties in ascertaining whether certain words really owe their existence to Portuguese or whether Portuguese itself received them from other sources ; of this kind are terms like pires (saucer), yago (stammerer), cangu (yoke), bafo (breath) ; again, whether Portuguese or English is the real source of such words as biscoito (biscuit), botelha (bottle), batata (potato), estala (stable) ; whether certain terms were already known and in use before the Portuguese discoveries and conquests,

² There are also some among those presuming to be well informed in these matters who maintain that with the exception of tôpo (top), camara (room), fita (ribbon), 'and few other words, the Portuguese domination in India left few traces of their language'. Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine quoted by Schuchardt.

such as tabaco (tobacco), arratel (pound weight), chá (tea), café (coffee); whether certain terms are in fact not instances of parallelisms, sometimes with very slight change of meaning, such as chapa (stamp or mark), tanque (tank), varanda (veranda).¹

XII. The Method observed in this Work

Among the Portuguese words in this work, there are some whose etymology is evident or almost certain; there are others whose source in the indigenous languages is doubtful or improbable and, finally, there are a few of which it can be said with certainty or with great probability, that they are not the originals of the Asiatic vocables.

Those which come under the second head I have marked with a note of interrogation placed at the very beginning when the doubt embraces all the languages mentioned, or placed before one or more of them when the uncertainty is limited to these. Those of the third class I have distinguished with an asterisk, and I have indicated the reasons for the inclusion of such in my list and also for rejecting them as the etymons of the Asiatic words; I have done this lest it might appear that I had omitted to mention them because I was not acquainted with them. .

There are some words which are not genuine Portuguese words and which, therefore, the Portuguese could not have carried with them from Europe; they belong to an Asiatic language or group of languages. But as such words form part of the Asio-Lusitanian vocabulary and were adopted and disseminated by the Portuguese I thought they should have a place in this work after due reservation had been made.

I have mentioned diverse derivatives and compounds of the more important Portuguese words met with in the indigenous languages, and I have done this to prove how the foreign word had acquired a general vogue. In some cases I have also pointed out the zone in which the word is current or the class of people who employ it. Not infrequently I have mentioned the vernacular terms which more or less correspond to the Portuguese words, in order to show that it was not the absolute lack of these in the indigenous languages that led to the adoption of the foreign vocable. I have not carried this process very far because besides making the work too prolix it would involve too great labour.

The vernacular terms, which I have cited as the equivalents of the Portuguese and as common to languages of one family, are reproduced in their original form : in Konkani, in the Indo-Aryan ; in Tamil, in the Dravidian ; and in Malay, as belonging to the Malayan group.

In the tabulation of Asiatic languages there were two methods open to me, viz. to adopt the geographical or the genealogical, and these do not always coincide. I preferred to make use of the genealogical and the one which traces affinities, at the same time maintaining, whenever possible, the geographical continuity. In this way it is possible to appreciate better the changes that the Portuguese words undergo in cognate idioms. I began with the Indo-Aryan group of languages, taking for my starting point Konkani, and after this I ran through the field of Dravidian languages and then passed on to other families, groups and unrelated languages.

I have collected in a general index all the Portuguese words introduced into the various languages which are the subject matter of this study, and have indicated such as do not figure in the body of the work by italics. From this it will be possible to see very easily the number and the nature of the words that have been adopted into the Asiatic languages.

In order that it may be possible to see at a glance the Portuguese vocables that have been taken over into each of the different languages, I have prepared separate lists of each of them ; in these especial lists I have included words employed exclusively in Konkani or in Teto or Galoli, but which I had omitted from the body of the work.

The Portuguese words or such as are presumed to be of Portuguese origin which I have listed in the different Asiatic languages are almost all which are known after reliable scientific inquiry to have been really employed in these several languages. As the result of mere conjectures or inferences, it would have been possible to augment greatly their number in cognate languages.

XIII. *Brief Notes on each of the Languages*¹

In this chapter I shall present a brief survey of each of the languages which enter into this study in the order in which they figure in it. Besides the filiation and the nature of the language I shall set out the area, the population, the dialects, characters, the antiquity of its literature, etc. I shall indicate also the vehicles by which the Portuguese words found their way into each. In respect of each of these languages I shall quote the various authorities whose studies have reference to the subject of this work.

1. Konkani¹

Konkani or Concani, formerly called by the Portuguese under a mistaken notion, Lingua Canarina or *Canarim*² (the Kanarese language) and Brâmana (the Brahmin language) is the southernmost representative of the Aryan family in India. It is spoken, according to the opinion of Dr. Gerson da Cunha, by about 2 millions in an area of about 7,000 square miles. Its original home is Goa and on this account and with a view to avoid a confusion between it and a Marathi dialect, it has been called by modern philologists Gomantaki, from Gomanta which is the ancient name for Goa.

Konkani extends, due probably in part to the diversity of its political boundaries and in part to emigration, on the north up to Malvan, and on the south to Kanara as far as Mangalore. There are in consequence three principal dialects of it: that of the north, Kudali, influenced by Marathi; that of Goa, Gomantaki, properly so called, and that of the south influenced by Kanarese and without any special name.

The dialect of Goa is divided into two classes: the language of the Novas Conquistas (New Conquests) which is more influenced by Marathi, and that of the Velhas Conquistas (Old Conquests) which is more under the influence of Portuguese. Again, the vernacular of the Velhas Conquistas is subdivided into the dialect of Bardez and that of Salsete; the former is regarded as purer and is more inflexional, the latter more analytic and enriched by Portuguese and Kanarese words. The language spoken in Ilhas (the insular portions of Goa) partakes of the characteristics of the dialects of the two afore-mentioned districts.

With regard to the nature and the origin of the Konkani language I shall transcribe what I wrote in my Konkani-Portuguese Dictionary : ' From what precedes I will briefly sum up my conclusions : (1) Konkani is an Aryan language and inflexional, not Dravidian and agglutinative ; (2) it resembles Bālābhāshā ; (3) it is less removed from Sanskrit in its grammatical structure and in its vocabulary than is Marathi ; (4) it is not a dialect or corruption of Marathi ; (5) it approximates more to ancient Marathi (which in its turn comes very near to Bālābhāshā) than to the modern ; (6) it is allied very much in its phonetic structure to the Gaurian languages of the North, specially Bengali ; (7) it represents with much probability Sarasvati which orientalists regard as being extinct, for those who introduced it into the Konkani were emigrants from Tirhotra or Tirhut '.¹

In Goa, for the purposes of writing, Roman characters with Portuguese sound values are employed ; in the north, Marathi bālbodh or moḍī characters are used ; in Kanara, Kanarese or Roman characters. Old writings in Kanarese as well as in Devanagiri are extant and the scripts of these two languages must be regarded as the proper alphabets of Konkani.

The territory in which Konkani is most spoken being under Portuguese rule for four centuries, it is but natural that it should have admitted Portuguese words more largely than any other language. A tenth or perhaps more of the colloquial speech of the Velhas Conquistas is made up of Portuguese words or of words that are derived from Portuguese. In the Dictionary referred to above I included the following : (1) All words of Portuguese origin which had been adopted by one or more of the Oriental languages besides Konkani; because this fact in itself is a sure indication of the need or convenience afforded by such words. (2) All Portuguese vocables that have become so naturalised that they are to be met with in the speech of the people without attracting attention as to their origin; such terms were adopted either with the object of marking a dividing line between the Hindu and the Christian population or because the vernacular terms were not found adequate, or, again, because the indigenous term was not commonly known, or in order to avoid the trouble of coining new terms. (3) Many Portuguese words which are more in use than their corresponding vernacular equivalents. (4) Some Portuguese words that were entirely unnecessary, and this I did in order to show that the language (Konkani) possesses a large number of corresponding equivalents and that only culpable neglect or pedantry could have led to the use of the foreign words.

In the present work I have restricted the choice of the Portuguese vocables in Konkani much further. I have omitted from it all Portuguese words which are used exclusively in Konkani, and are not to be found in any other indigenous language. Such terms which have been left out from the body of the book have been listed however in the special index of this language, appended to this work.¹

2. Marathi²

Marathi is the language spoken in Maharashtra (the great region or country of the Mahars) by 18,237,899 people according to the census of 1901 ; in this I have included the Konkani that is spoken in British territory. Its zone which takes in a vast area extends from Goa to the river Damaun (Daman Ganga), and on its eastern boundaries impinges on Kanarese and Telugu. It has three principal dialects : Khandesi, Dakhini and Konkani ; to these some philologists add Gomantaki, more correctly called Konkani.

¹ In my Dicionário Português-Konkani, published by the Portuguese Government in 1905, I have mentioned almost all the words in common use more or less in Gomantaki.

² See John Wilson, Notes on the constituent elements, the diffusion and application of the Marāthī Language, in Molesworth's Dictionary. Dr. Stevenson, An Essay on the points of similarity and dissimilarity between the English and Marāthī Languages, in Candy's Dictionary. Filipe Néri Pires, Grammatica Maratha.

Marathi owing to its importance occupies the second place in the Gaurian languages. It is much cultivated ; there are primary schools in all parts where it is taught and it possesses a rich literature, especially suited for school purposes ¹ ; its oldest literary specimens which are poetical and religious belong to the 13th century.

Marathi has two alphabets : Bālbodh (or Bālbod) which is, with slight variations, the same as Devanagri or Sanskrit, and is employed in the schools and in the press ; Modi or Mod, which is peculiar to it, has fewer characters and makes no distinction between short and long vowels (i, ī, u, ū) ; it is written in a cursive manner without any separation of letters and is employed for correspondence and in manuscripts.

Its copious vocabulary, consisting of 20,000 words, is made up of the aboriginal Turanic stock, of Prakrit through Magadhi (the ancient language of Behar), of the Sanskrit, through its literature, of Arabic and Persian owing to the Mussulman domination and the influence of Hindustani, and of Portuguese and English.

The infiltration of Portuguese words into the language is due to the former Portuguese dominion over Bombay, Thana, Bassein and Chaul ; to commerce (Surat, Bijapur) ; to the vicinage of Goa and Damaun ; to the Portuguese missions in the greater part of the Marathi language-field, and to the Portuguese dialect of the Indian Christians who now go by the name of

‘ East Indians ’ and who were formerly called ‘ Norteiros ’¹ (Northerners) because their home was to the north of Goa, the Portuguese metropolis in India.

It is above all in the district of Konkan that the influence of Portuguese is most marked.

3. Gujarati²

Gujarati, the language of Gujarat, is bounded on the north by Hindi, and, on the south and east, by Marathi. It is spoken by a population of 10 millions and is very much cultivated at the present day ; it is employed a great deal in the periodical press of Bombay. It is the language, the rich and cultured Parsi community (which originally emigrated from Persia) employs as its vernacular, and it is the lingua franca of commerce, especially in the city of Bombay.

It has several dialects such as the Surati, Ahmedabadi, Kattiawari and the Mercantile.

The elements that go to constitute its vocabulary are the same as those of Marathi. It likewise has two alphabets : one its own, with few consonants and without distinction of short and long vowels (i, u), and the other, Bālbodh or Devanagri, a little defective and clumsy in form. Gujarati is the vernacular of the Portuguese possessions, Daman and Diu, where there are Government schools in which it is taught ; thus the influence of Portuguese in these parts is direct and real with a tendency towards expansion. The dictionaries of the language, which are at present deficient, do not however list all the Portuguese words used in these localities, but only such as form part of the general vocabulary and which found their way into the language as the result of political relations in former times, or of vicinage and commerce.

4. Hindi

Hindi is the most important language in India, occupying almost the centre of its language-field whether we look at it from the standpoint of area covering 248,000 square miles ; or of the numbers that speak the language—almost 73 millions ; or from its vitality in ever spreading itself and absorbing other languages, or from the number of its dialects—fifty-eight according to Cust, some of which can pass for real languages. There are philologists who consider that Gujarati, Panjabi and Nepalese should be considered as dialects of Hindi. Beames mentions the following as the principal dialects of the language: Maithili, Magadhi, Bhojpuri, Kosali, Brijbasha, Kanauji, Rajputani (group of dialects), Bundelkhandi. Sir Grierson divides Hindi into two parts: Eastern and Western.

Though Hindi is derived from Indo-Aryan, nevertheless, it contains a large number of words of Turanic descent and a considerable admixture of Arab-Persian loan words. It is generally written in the Devanagri script. Literary Hindi has passed through three stages, archaic, that is at least 700 years old, Hindi of the middle period and the current language.

The influence of Portuguese on it is principally mediate through the intervention of other neighbouring languages. It appears scarcely likely that the influence could have proceeded from politico-commercial relations which were not very frequent.¹

5. Hindustani

Without entering into the question whether Hindustani is a language by itself or rather a dialect of Hindi, as it is generally supposed to be, I am treating it under a separate head owing to the especial nature of my work. Formed from 16th century Persian which was the language spoken by the Mahommedan conquerors, and from Hindi, the vernacular of the indigenous population, upon a grammatical structure which is Indo-Aryan, but written usually in a script which is a modification of Arabic and Persian, Hindustani became the mother tongue of the Mahommedans of every part of India and developed into the lingua franca of commerce in the principal centres of trade. 'Hindustani is', says Beames, 'by far the most widely spread and commonly understood of all Indian languages, and is spoken as a lingua franca by people whose mother tongue it is not, all over India.'

'Hindustani or Urdu is not a territorial dialect,' says Cust, 'it can scarcely correctly be said that it is the common language of any one district though spoken by many classes'. But Sir Grierson maintains that it is the vernacular of the Upper Gangetic plain and of the surrounding country.

It is true that both terms Urdu and Hindustani are used promiscuously, but Urdu denotes properly speaking, the form of the literary language, purer and more polished, and Hindustani, the common speech diluted by the admixture of exotic words.

The Hindustani of the north is purer and is distinguished from that of the south or Dekkani which is more corrupt. 'A still further degradation or dilution of the language', says Cust, 'takes place by the introduction of Romance-Aryan words in the dialect of the Portuguese settlements on the west coast of India'. In the existing dominions of the Portuguese in India Hindustani is not current.

The influence of Portuguese on Hindustani which is more noticeable in the Dekkani variant is due chiefly to the intercourse and commercial and political relations of former days¹ and to the facility which Hindustani has of assimilating foreign vocables.

6. Laskari-Hindustani

Lascari or lascarim from the Persian lashkari, first employed by the Portuguese and subsequently adopted by the Dutch and the English in its original meaning, 'soldier',¹ came afterwards to denote the indigenous sailor and is in this sense synonymous with the Arab-Hindustani 'khalasi'.² And as it is generally the Mussulmans who are the crews of vessels bound on long voyages, their speech was given the name of Lashkari-Hindustani.

Now, it is but natural that in the formation of this dialect of sea-faring men there should figure very many words from the language of those Europeans who were the first to cross the seas to India and who exclusively dominated them for a long period. The English language is to-day playing a similar, and in an equal measure, a supplementary part. The vocabulary of Lashkari-Hindustani is therefore an admixture of Hindustani, properly so called, of the Portuguese of the 16th and 17th centuries, and of the present-day English.³

The study of this 'confusion of tongues' has a special interest because of the variety of forms and the phonetic changes which are represented in the Portuguese words which have issued from the speech of an unlettered people during the long space of

'With the exception of some (Portuguese) who go as masters or pilots on their own ships or on those of His Majesty, the crew and company are all Mohammedans who are called Laschares (whence it is that the soldiers were commonly designated Lascharis).' João de Lucena, Bk. IV, Ch. 1.

time they have been current among them. Probably some technical expressions owing to the very mutilated form in which they exist at present have escaped me whilst going through the dictionary of this dialect.¹

7. Nepali²

Nepali, Gorkhali, Khas, and Parbatya are the names of the language of the court and lingua franca of Nepal. It is spoken by 3 millions of people who are for the most part Hindus, and the script employed is Devanagri. Its literature is very scanty and of little importance ; it has several dialects.³

Strictly speaking Nepali is a dialect of Hindi, deriving its origin from Rajasthani, which is the vernacular of Rajputana. Besides this the numerous non-Aryan languages spoken by the Tibeto-Burman races have influenced its vocabulary. Hunter mentions thirty-six of them in his comparative dictionary.

The influence of Portuguese on this language is entirely mediate by way of Hindi. Unfortunately the English-Nepalese list of words which I have with me is a very concise one. Nevertheless it is safe to assume that a large part of the Portuguese words which are to be found in Hindi have found an entrance into Nepali.

8. Oriya

Oriya, Uriya or Utkala is the language spoken in Orissa by a population of over 9½ millions over an area of 60,000 square miles within the provinces of Bengal and Madras and the Central Provinces. It belongs together with Bihari, Bengali, and Assamese, to the eastern Sanskritic group, which was derived immediately from the ancient speech of Magadha, the home of Buddhism.¹

¹ Portuguese words employed both in Hindustani and Lashkari-Hindustani are mentioned in this work only with reference to the former of these two languages in order to avoid repetition.

Oriya has several dialects : the Northern, the Southern, that of Sumbhulpur, of Kalakundi ; but that of Cuttack is regarded as the standard. Its alphabet is based on Devanagri with modifications in different parts of the language-field. It is the only one of the North Indian characters to adopt the curvilinear form of the upper strokes which in the other are horizontal.² Its earliest literary monuments date back to 400 years.

The Portuguese influence on Oriya is chiefly mediate, through the intervention of Telugu in the south and Bengali in the north, though in former times there was commercial intercourse between the Portuguese and Orissa.³

9. Bengali

Bengali, as the name indicates, is the vernacular of Bengal spoken by more than 44 millions, Hindus as well as Mahommedans. It is at the present day much cultivated by the Babus, which is the most cultured and progressive class among the peoples of India. The literary tongue differs a great deal from the spoken, not only in respect of the vocabulary but even in its morphology and is to a good extent sanskritised. It uses an alphabet which is a picturesque variant of Devanagri.

² Cust tries to explain this peculiarity by saying that it was necessitated by the writing materials being an iron stylus and a leaf of the fan-palm ; straight incised lines would have split the palm. But such materials are or were common to other languages.

Bengali has several dialects which are not properly distinguished. Beames groups them under the generic heads of Eastern, Northern, and Southern, that of Central Bengal being the one which is normal. But there are other dialects mixed in character, which have issued from the contact of Bengali with Hindi and Oriya on both frontiers, and also those which have been the result of the contact with non-Aryan languages (Kolarian and Tibeto-Burman) on the east and the west flank, especially by millions of non-Aryans passing into semi-Hinduism, and among these Cusht distinguishes those of Purneah, Rungpur, Kuch, Sylhet, Rabha, Meeyang, and Chittagong.

Portugal had a factory at Bandel on the Ugli or Ogolim (Hooghly); it had a large colony in Calcutta, and held constant commercial relations with various parts and, even to-day, owns important missionary stations endowed with extensive estates.¹ From these circumstances sprang a Portuguese dialect, the range of which at present is much circumscribed and which threatens to disappear wholly. These facts explain the introduction of numerous Portuguese words into Bengali. The descendants of European families use many a term relating to sweets and foods (and this happens in other parts of Asia as well) without, so much as, a thought of their origin.

10. Assamese²

Assamese is the language spoken in the plain of Assam by the entire population of the Brahmaputra valley which is about a million and a half.³

'Just like the King of Orixá, and the King of Bengala, who have many ports which we visit and with which we trade.' João de Barros, Dec. III, II, 5.

² See Bronson, A Dictionary in Assamese and English.

³ In the mountainous parts there are non-Aryan tribes, who have a language of their own, one of which, Khassi, is included in this study.

Neither the Ahoms, invaders of the Tai family, in spite of their long domination, nor the Burmese and the Kacharis, members of the Tibeto-Burman family, nor the Mahomedans have left any trace on the language which is closely akin to Bengali.

Assamese is laden with Sanskrit loan words which have been introduced in modern times and, at times, with a modified meaning and pronunciation. It has a script of its own in which the Bible has been translated; but the characters of Bengali are also employed. Since the last two or three centuries it has a literature in prose and verse. The language of the larger number of the poetic compositions differs from that of the Buronjies or Histories which are in prose. At present, as it is the official language of the Provincial Government, it is hoped that it will be extensively cultivated.

The Portuguese words which found an entry into it did so by way of Bengali and Hindustani.

11. Sindhi¹

Sindhi is the language of the valley of the lower Indus from Multan to the sea; on the east it merges into the Rajputana dialects of Hindi, and on the west into the Beluch dialects. It is spoken by about three million people made up of Hindus and Mussulmans. It is generally written in Arabic characters, with many modifications to represent the cerebrals and aspirates of an Aryan language.² Its principal dialects are : Siraí, Vicholi, Lari, Uch, and Kachi.

The vocabulary of Sindhi like that of Hindustani, with the exception of its own original stock, is made up of Sanskrit, Arabic and Persian words. The influence of Pushtu, its Iranic neighbour is especially notable. All the words terminate in vowels as they do in Italian; all those ending in an u and o being masculine.

² As Sindhi has more sounds than those which are provided for by Devanagiri characters, whenever it employs this alphabet, it uses diacritical marks with the ordinary letters in order to distinguish these sounds.

It has no neuter gender. The Portuguese influence on it is, it appears, almost wholly mediate and very limited if we are to judge from the dictionaries of the language hitherto published.

12. Punjabi¹

Punjabi is the language spoken from the Indus to the Sutlej and from Multan to the mountain ranges ; it is the language of about 17 millions and is written in a variety of characters of the Aryan alphabet, the principal of which is Gurmukhi. For official correspondence and for the purposes of general literature the Arabic character is preferred.

Owing to its very close relationship with Hindi, many philologists prefer to regard it as a dialect of the latter. It has a large number of dialects. Beames says that every district of the Punjab has its own dialect, and there are even districts having more than one dialectical variation ; Cust who has greater competence to speak on this subject disputes this statement. The more important of these dialects are according to Maya Singh : Punjabi properly so called, Multani, Pathohari, and Pahadi.²

In the vocabulary, besides its original stock of Hindi, Arabic and Persian words, many Portuguese terms have found their way through the intervention of Hindustani.

13. Kashmiri

Kashmiri is the vernacular of the Valley of Kashmere, spoken by about three millions or according to Sir Grierson by about a million ; it is the most northerly member of the Indo-Aryan language-family. It is not a cultivated language and never has been reduced to writing in its actual form, nor has it a grammar or a dictionary worthy of the name. It is therefore a spoken language, Persian being the language of the court and of correspondence. Even as such, there are three varieties of Kashmiri spoken : that of the Brahmins, loaded with Sanskrit words ; the form used by Mahommedans and sown thickly with Arabic and Persian words ; and lastly the one used by the common people, which preserves the old local form and dialectical variations.

¹ See Bhai Maya Singh, The Punjabi Dictionary, Introduction.

² Grierson speaks of Multani as Lahnda and regards it as a distinct language very different from Punjabi, and gives it a population of more than three millions. [In the Census report of 1921 Lahnda or Western Punjabi is given a population of over 5½ millions.—ED.]

This language might well have been left out by me in this work in view of the fact that there exists till now only a vocabulary of the language, in which not even half a dozen of Portuguese words can be traced, some of them being of an uncertain origin. But it appears to me natural that there should be more of them, connected with objects carried into the country by the Mussulman conquerors.

14. Sinhalese¹

Besides the Vedas, the aboriginal inhabitants of Ceylon whose number is at the present day very much reduced,² the two indigenous races that people the island are, the Dravidian, in the north, which emigrated from India in some time immemorial, and the Aryan, brought there by Vijaya in the 6th century B.C. The vernacular of the former is Tamil, and of the latter, Sinhalese or Chinglá, as it is called in the creole language.³

It is a much debated question among philologists of the Indian languages as to whether Sinhalese should be classified as an Aryan or a Dravidian tongue. Clough, Max Müller, Cust,

² 'There is a class of people whom they call Bédas : in colour they are almost like us, and some are dark brown ; their language is not understood by any Chingalá or other people of India, and their converse is only with one another.' João Ribeiro, Fatalidade Historica da Ilha de Ceilão, Bk. 1, Ch. 24.

Alwis lean to the former view. This appears to be more likely in view of the linguistic investigations of Childers.¹

Sinhalese is at least two thousand years old ; it had a very copious literature dating back from the 4th century and reckons almost two millions who speak it. It has two dialects : the Elu which is the archaic form of the language and which is characterised by the phonetic decadence of Aryan words (tad-bhāvas) ; and the modern language, the Sinhalese, used by the people, which has admitted in its fold a large number of words without any notable changes from Sanskrit, and from Pali which is the sacred language of the Buddhists to which religion belong the large majority of the Sinhalese.² It has its own alphabet which has a few more vowels than Devanagri.³

The Portuguese domination asserted itself in Ceylon more intensely and at the same time more extensively than in the different other possessions and exercised an influence so intense and many-sided, that Holland with all her efforts was not able to extinguish it, nor appreciably reduce the traces of its existence. To attest to the truth of this statement there exist two memorials of very high value ; first of all, the Portuguese dialect, which is the most important of all the creole Portuguese languages and which up to this day is full of vitality⁴ ; secondly, the introduction in the Sinhalese diction, which is otherwise very well stocked, of a host of Portuguese terms. In this latter respect Sinhalese occupies a place second only to Konkani among Indian languages.

² ' There exists among them a language which is not used by the common people ; it is much like what Latin is among us.' João Ribeiro, Bk. 1, Ch. 16.

⁴ See Dialecto Indo-Português de Ceilão, by the author.

It is necessary to realise that this result was in a large measure due to the existence of the creole Portuguese language.

15. Tamil¹

Tamil is the principal member of the Dravidian family whether we consider it with reference to its splendid culture, or the copiousness of its vocabulary, or the antiquity and the wealth of its literature. No other language, says Rice, 'combines greater force and concision, or is more exact and philosophic in its modes of expressions'.²

Its language-field extends from the Ghats to the gulf of Bengal and from Calicut to Cape Comorin. It is also spoken in the southern part of Travancore and in the northern portion of Ceylon and in some other regions. The people speaking the language number about 16½ millions. It has an alphabet of its own which employs 30 letters for its own script and besides four more for writing Sanskrit words which in the latter case is known as Grantha. It includes two forms or dialects, the classical or the ancient and the colloquial or the modern called respectively

² The Portuguese, according to their practice of giving to a language the name of the country wherein it was spoken called Malayalam, the language current on the West Coast, Malabar, and also by this name designated the language that was in vogue as far as the Coromandel coast, there being a similarity between the two. The other European nations adopted this designation which is at present falling into disuse. 'First of these races whom I call foreigners who dwell in Malabar is a caste called Chatis, natives of the province of Charamandel They speak a tongue which differs from that of Malabar in the same way as Castilians speak a language different from that of the Portuguese.' Duarte Barbosa, p. 340. [Hak. Soc. ed. Longworth Dames, Vol. II, pp. 71 and 73.]

the Sen and the Kodun,¹ which differ from each other so widely that they might almost be regarded as different languages.

Tamil, jealous of its vernacularity, admits foreign words into it with difficulty; even the importation of Sanskrit words is very limited and these are very little used in classical works, the earliest of which date back more than a thousand years.

The Portuguese influence on it which is not a little considerable arose from various sources: domination of certain tracts of the country, trade, religion and missionary contact, Portuguese creole dialects now almost extinct, and the intercourse between the Tamils and the Portuguese in the various parts under the occupation of the latter.

16. Malayalam²

Malayalam is the language spoken along the Malabar coast from Chandraguri near Mangalore to Trivandrum by about six millions of people. Regarded in its origin as a dialect of Tamil, it developed into a sister language owing to Brahmin influence about the 9th century, by discarding the use of the personal terminations of the verbs and by availing itself of a large number of Sanskrit derivatives. Its alphabet is based upon the Aryan. The Mahommedan inhabitants, called Mappilas, have a dialect of their own and have adopted Arabic characters, though modified, for their script.

Malabar was the country which the Portuguese first discovered and in part conquered and christianised and which for a long time remained under their dominion. Even at the present day there is a Portuguese bishopric in Cochin, and a corrupt form of Portuguese which is in a moribund state³ is also in use there.

² See Gundert, A Malayalam and English Dictionary.

³ Dr. Hugo Schuchardt published a small monograph on this corrupt Portuguese dialect.

Again from or through Malabar were introduced many Indian terms into Portugal, such as : manga (mango), cairo (coir), bétel (betel), ola (palm-leaf), teca (teak-wood), chatim (merchant); there were some that were introduced into Indo-Portuguese, like : jagra (jaggery or unrefined sugar), chuname (lime), pinaca (cocoanut or sesame cake), mainato (washerman).

17. Telugu¹

Telugu or Telinga, in respect of its culture and its glossarial copiousness ranks next to Tamil in the list of the Dravidian languages, but surpasses it in point of euphonic sweetness and the number of those that speak it, viz. over 20 millions.²

It ranges from Pulicat to Chicacole and on the west impinges on the boundaries of Marathi. It has a character which is a variation of the Aryan, and its literature dates back as far as the 12th century of our era. Its present-day vocabulary is greatly strewn with exotics, the greater part of which are Sanskrit and Hindustani.

The influence of Portuguese on Telugu is evident from the close and constant relations, political and commercial, that existed between the rulers of Bisnagar or Bisnaga (Vijayanagar) and also from its contiguity to Tamil and Marathi and its contact with Hindustani.

The number of Portuguese words that have been adopted in the popular form of the language is very large and some of them are exclusively borrowed by it and by no other language.

It is interesting to note how the name Gentoo (from the Port. gentio, gentile) came to be used by the English for a long time in a restricted sense to the Telugu-speaking Hindus. The Portuguese spoke of this people more correctly as Badagas, Tamil Vadugar, Kanarese Badaga. 'The next province which marches with the kingdom of Narsyngua, they call Telingu.' Duarte Barbosa, p. 291. [Hak. Soc. ed. Longworth Dames, Vol. I, p. 183.]

² 'He was appointed Governor of the District of the Talingas, who are the Hindus whose language is more developed than that of any other people in the Deccan'. Diogo do Couto, Dec. IV, X, 4.

18. Kanarese

Kanarese is spoken throughout the plateau of Mysore and in some of the western districts of the Nizam's territory ; it is spoken also (together with Konkani, Tulu, and Malayalam but more extensively than any of them) in Kanara, on the Malabar coast, a district which was subjected for centuries to the rule of Kanarese princes.¹ It is the language of over 10 millions of inhabitants.

Kanarese like the other Dravidian tongues has two dialects : the classical or the ancient Kanarese and the colloquial or modern. The former differs from the latter not only in respect of its vocabulary but also because of the use of different inflexional terminations. The Kanarese alphabet is, with very slight changes, identically the same as that of Telugu.

The influence of Portuguese on it is due, in a measure, to domination, to political and commercial relations, to colonists from Goa, to missionary labours and the proximity of other language-fields.

19. Tulu²

Tulu or Tulava is the name of a language of not much importance both in respect of population and its language-field ; for it is spoken in a limited area bounded by the rivers Chandraguiri and Kalyanpuri, in the district of Kanara, by about 500,000 individuals. Notwithstanding its want of literature, except for some legends inscribed on palm leaves, it is one of the most highly developed languages of the Dravidian family and is more closely allied to Kanarese than to Malayalam, and has some dialects. Sanskrit, Kanarese, Malayalam, and Hindustani words are grafted on to its original stock. The Malayalam alphabet was formerly employed, but now the Kanarese script has become inseparably associated with the language.

¹ As is evident there was a geographical displacement of the ancient name Karnata or Karnataka, corrupted into Kannada, Kanara. By Carnatic the English mean the eastern footboard of the Ghauts on the Coromandel coast. The old Portuguese, in their turn also, twisted geography and ethnology by speaking of the natives of Goa as 'Canarins' and of their language as 'Canarim' or 'Canarina'. This error has survived even to this day, though it is obvious that the indigenous population of the Konkani ought to be called Konkani. Duarte Barbosa calls modern Canara Tolinate 'i.e. Tulu nālu, or the modern district of S. Canara'. Hobson-Jobson. [Hak. Soc. Longworth Dame's Transl., Vol. 1, p. 183.]

The number of Portuguese words adopted in the language is considerable and more even than in the adjacent languages. I am unable to furnish a reason for this, unless it be the emigration of Hindus from Goa. Religious terms in Portuguese were introduced by Protestant missionaries.

20. Anglo-Indian Vocabulary¹

The English language has not begotten any bastard variety of itself in India, nor is it likely that any will issue from it in course of time. But the vocabulary of English spoken in India is sown thick, as is but natural, with indigenous terms.

When the English arrived in India, a corrupt form of Portuguese was the lingua franca of the country, as much between Europeans and Indians as between the Europeans themselves who belonged to different nationalities.

It is no matter for surprise, therefore, if Portuguese should have furnished a large contingent of words to Anglo-Indian vocabulary, directly or through the medium of the vernaculars. Even so, many indigenous terms found entry into it by way of Portuguese, such as : areca, betel, benzoin, coir, copra, corge, congee, godown, mandarin, mango, palanquin, monsoon, typhoon, etc.²

Many of the words derived from Portuguese are now obsolete, whilst some are in vogue only in certain parts. On the other hand the diffusion of many Portuguese words among the vernaculars is due to it. Hence Anglo-Indian vocabulary has been included in my work.¹

21. Indo-French Vocabulary²

The French arrived late in India, and found there the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the English engaged in a struggle. They exercised scarcely any influence of a general and abiding character on the country. No corrupt form of French is in use in any of its very tiny colonies just as none is current in the English colonies. Indo-Portuguese used to be spoken in them just as it is even now spoken there though on a smaller scale side by side with the Indian vernaculars.³

Like the Anglo-Indian vocabulary, the French spoken in India borrowed a number of words which are of genuine Portuguese extraction and very many Asiatic terms that had first been taken over into Portuguese; these, not to speak of such terms as were received directly from the vernacular languages were, generally speaking, carried into it through the agency of Indo-Portuguese. Several of these terms which were used to denote an object peculiar to India travelled over to France and became naturalised there; the same happened when many Anglo-Indian expressions were received into its bosom by European English.

The reasons that led me to include Anglo-Indian vocabulary within the range of my survey have also led me to examine Indo-French, though the importance of the latter is not so great.

² See Aristide Marre, Notice sur la langue portugaise dans l'Inde Française et en Malaisie.

³ Dr. Schuchardt includes Pondicherry and Chandernagore among the regions in which Indo-Portuguese is spoken, and gives specimens of the Portuguese dialect of Mahe. And E. A. Marre says: 'Il résulte évidemment des propres termes de l'Annuaire que le portugais est parlé par une partie de la population de l'Inde française.'

I do not know of any other work on the subject besides the one cited by me and I turned my attention to Indo-French only at the eleventh hour when I felt convinced that the Portuguese influence on it was not insignificant. It is, therefore, very natural that the list of Portuguese vocables in Indo-French furnished by me should be incomplete.

22. Garo

In the lower part of the Assam valley there is a group of languages of small importance, called Bodo, belonging to the Tibeto-Burman family, and spoken by about 600,000 individuals. One of these languages is Garo, spoken by about 186,000 ; it has various dialects and the language itself has been sufficiently studied. There are schools in which it is taught and school and religious books written in it ; this is due to American missionaries who, however, in teaching it make use of English books in place of the Bengali, and employ largely English terminology in addition to the Aryan.

The Portuguese words which have penetrated into Garo have done so by way of Assamese, and of Bengali, and some of them, perhaps, through the medium of the missionaries.

23. Burmese

Burmese spoken by $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions is an agglutinative and cultivated language. It has many Aryan words which were introduced by Buddhism, the prevailing religion, side by side with Pali literature. It has an alphabet of its own, derived from the Indian. Its principal dialects are : Arakanese, Tavoyee or Taneagsari, and Yo.

Besides Tibetan, Burmese is the only other important member of the Tibeto-Burman linguistic family. Its literature dates back several centuries ; but the language of the literature does not differ much from Siamese.

The influence of Portuguese on it, to judge from the single vocabulary which has come to my hands, is very limited. Some more words that derive their origin from the Portuguese ought naturally to exist, carried into the country either by traders or Portuguese adventurers, or introduced by way of Bengali or Siamese.

24. Tibetan¹

Tibetan is in a stage of transition from the monosyllabic to the agglutinative type. It possesses a vast literature, ancient and modern, and four different forms of syllabic alphabets, derived from the Aryan and introduced in the 7th century.² The literary language is very different from the colloquial. Tibet, according to Bell, is essentially a land of dialects; a proverb much in vogue says, 'each district has its dialect and every Lama his own doctrine'. The most important is the dialect of Lhasa, which is regarded as the standard and is the lingua franca for the whole of the country.

The influence of Portuguese on Tibet is almost nil; in a vocabulary of the language I discovered only two words of Portuguese provenance. All the same, there was a Portuguese mission founded in Tibet in 1642 by the Jesuit António de Andrade and carried on subsequently by Fathers Gonçalo de Sousa and João Cabral.³ At the present time with greater facilities of communication between Tibet and India, it is but natural to expect more Portuguese words to find their way into the language.

25. Khassi⁴

In the southern frontier of the valley of Assam, to the east of India proper, betwixt the Garo and the Naga tribes, is the country of the Khassi-Jyntia tribes whose population is about 200,000 and which speak a language known as Khassi, or Kossia. In this part is situated Shillong the seat of the Government of the Province of Assam. Morphologically, Khassi belongs to the monosyllabic order; genealogically Beames includes it in the Lohotic or Burmese class. Cust regards it as a family by itself and Grierson basing himself on the authority of Kuhn, affiliates it to the sub-family Mon-Khmer of the Indo-Chinese family.

It has neither character nor literature of its own; the Roman character on account of its convenience has now been adopted in the composition of a grammar and dictionary of the language by English missionaries and in writing school texts.¹

It has several dialects, the common being the Cheara; it has also a rich vocabulary, composed in a great measure of onomatopoeic terms, and containing an infiltration of Bengali and Hindustani words. It is through the medium of these two languages that Portuguese words have passed into it, without these semi-savages ever having heard the name of Portugal. And this is exactly what will happen in analogous cases.²

26. Kambojan

The Kambojan language is at the present day the principal representative of the sub-family Mon-Khmer, Khmer being the indigenous name of the country, now in a state of great decay, and likewise of the people who profess Buddhism. It is spoken by about a million in Cambodia and by about 500,000 in Siam and Annam. It has three dialects, Xong, Samre, and Khamen-Boran.

Kambojan is monosyllabic like the other branches of the family but it has no tones; it is so full of Siamese words that for a long time it was mistaken for Siamese. It likewise has loan words from Pali, Malay, Annamite, and Peguan contracted in the manner required by the tendency of the language. There are two modern characters, the sacred and the vulgar, both of them derived from Devanagiri ; it is rich in archaic literary monuments which date back to the 13th century.

The influence of Portuguese on Kambojan which is relatively speaking considerable, is due to the ancient commercial, political and religious relations, and to the influence on it of contiguous languages, especially Malayan.¹ The kingdom being at the present time a French protectorate, many French terms are being introduced in the language, and this of necessity causes doubt as regards the origin of certain Romance words found in it.

27. Siamese²

Siamese is the most important representative of the Tai branch of the sub-family Siamo-Chinese, and belongs like Chinese, to the class of monosyllabic, synthetic languages.³ The name Siam is a corruption of Sham, which is another name of the Tai or Thai race, which in the 7th century invaded Upper Burma and afterwards went and settled down in this country and in Assam.⁴

The Siamese language-field is vast ; it extends from Burma to the lake of Cambodia, and from the Gulf of Siam to the confines of Lao. It is spoken by about two million people who profess the Buddhism of the South, and it is written in a script which is of Indian origin and expresses tones by accents. It has an enormous religious and secular literature and three dialects : that of the sacred Buddhistic books, that of the higher orders, and that of the people. Its glossary according to Michell consists of 14,000 words and contains very many foreign words, most of them mutilated and derived from Pali, Sanskrit, Kambojan, Malay, Chinese, and the European languages.

³ But the Indo-Chinese languages were formerly inflective as recent investigations have proved. See Grierson, The Languages of India, p. 6.

⁴ The old Portuguese writers call Siam Sornau. See Fernão Mendes Pinto. Duarte Barbosa calls it Danseam. 'The second kingdom which is a continuation of this along the northern part is Chaumúa, the people of which have a language by themselves ; it is properly speaking the kingdom which we call SIÃO (Siam), a name unknown among its people and given to it by foreigners and not by them.' João de Barros, Dec. III, II, 5.

In view of the various kinds of relations that Portugal had with Siam, one should have expected that Siamese would contain many Portuguese vocables ; but there is a very small number of such that figure in their dictionaries, and this is a phenomenon that one notes also with regard to the other monosyllabic languages.¹ The educated people coin terms from the Sanskrit to denote new inventions such as telegraph, telephone, stenography ; and the journals, and the people in contact with the Europeans prefer words borrowed from the English.²

28-29. Annamite and Tonkinese

By Annamite or better still Annamese, is understood the language either of the ancient kingdom of Annam or in a more restricted sense, the Cochinchina dialect, to distinguish it from Tonkinese.³

Philologists are not in accord with regard to the classification of Annamese in general. Logan allies it to Mon-Khmer, con-

¹ There are in Siam 43 Portuguese, Catholics, who are permanent residents of the place. There are also 250 Portuguese of Chinese origin who have their names inscribed in the register at the consulate. Finally there are 68 more protected Portuguese of Chinese descent residing in Siam. stituting a separate group the Mon-Annan. Cust and Grierson throw doubts on this alleged connection, although there are Khmers in the country. Sylvain Levi traces, as the result of oral information that he has secured, a connection between it and Siamese or Tai, but admits the great influence of Chinese. All the same they don't seem to note in it any vestiges of Indian civilisation which disappears after Cambodia and gives place to the Chinese. The people are Buddhists but of the Chinese type, and possess an abundant literature, and employ a large number of Chinese ideographs used phonetically as a syllabary. The literati, however, prefer the entire Chinese alphabet. In view of the difficulty that the reading of these characters present, the Roman Catholic missionaries have invented an admirable system of adapting the Roman characters to these sounds, which is called Quoc ngu to represent faithfully all the tones and stresses of the language.

This is the system which is generally followed by philologists and according to Lajonquière, by the very natives of Cochinchina.¹

Tonkinese differs dialectically from Annamite; it has a literature and there are especial books to help its study; but to judge from its vocabulary the difference between the two is not very noticeable.² Both use the same European words, but they are very few and as a rule of French origin, except some religious terms which disclose a Portuguese source. Besides commercial intercourse, there were in Tonquin Portuguese missions which were very flourishing and which could count towards the middle

Of the Asiatic languages, Malay is after Konkani, one of the most important for my work and it was this which induced me to extend the orbit of my investigations outside the limits of India proper.³

The Malay language is spoken in Malacca and in the islands of Sumatra (mixed up with other languages), Banca, Billiton, in the Moluccas (or Maluco)⁴ and in some other parts. It is said to be spoken by more than 10 million people. There is the Malay language properly so called and what is spoken of as Low Malay. The former, which is the language spoken in Singapore and Malacca, possesses a literature both in prose and verse, written in a modified form of Arabic characters. The other or Low Malay, devoid of difficult sounds (gutturals) and complicated forms, is the lingua franca of the whole of the Archipelago, as Hindustani is of India, and as such is spoken by the indigenous population of the maritime ports, even though they be not Malay by race ; it is commonly written in Roman characters.⁵

³ 'It has a language of its own which is called Malay ; it is very sweet and easy to learn.' Castanheda, II, Ch. 112. 'On account of its refinement and its sweetness, Malay has deserved the just claim of being called the Italian of the East.' Favre.

⁵ 'The people of the country are called Malay, and the language of the country is likewise called by the same name ; for purposes of the trade of Malacca with the neighbouring islands, this language is used by almost all the islands and is understood among them.' Lucena, Historia da vida do Padre Francisco de Xavier, Bk. III, Ch. 10.

The language of Batavia belongs to Low Malay. Some Portuguese words assume in it especial forms, which are indicated in the present work, just like those which are peculiar to the Moluccas.¹

Malay has great powers of adaptability and contains many exotics, its vocabulary being laden with Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian, Javanese, Chinese, Telugu and European loan words.²

The influence of Portuguese on Malay, especially Low Malay, which has its origin in conquest, prolonged domination, trade, conversions, missions and in the corrupt Portuguese dialects spoken there, is enormous and deep-seated, for it is discernible in a very large number of words and extends even to verbs and particles.

Fortunately, there are many works of a general and special character dealing with this subject. The earliest is the dictionary of Fr. Haex which enters many terms which are not to be found in the present-day works either because they are really obsolete or because they were not in common use but confined and peculiar to missionaries and Christians.³ Among modern books

'Following the Portuguese came the Dutch, then the English and the Spaniards; in a word the whole of Europe came to plant itself in Malaysia, the language of which had naturally to be enriched by a new series of vocables belonging to different European languages.' Favre.

³ Says the author: 'At the foot of the Malay-Latin Dictionary are appended Portuguese and Tarnatic vocables, which are really in common use and which are mixed up with Malay words in the islands of Amboyana, Banda, Java, and the Moluccas'. As this appendix (pp. 51-54) was wanting in the copy of the National Library which formerly belonged to the old library of Alcobaga, a the dictionary of Senhor Gonçalves Viana deserves especial mention because in a great measure it takes in its fore-runners.

31. Achinese¹

Achinese is one of the languages spoken in Sumatra and which has, as its name indicates, its home in Achen (correctly Acheh) which lies in the northern extremity of the island and belongs to Holland.² It presents a very close affinity to the Malay language, but is less cultivated and less rich in its vocabulary. Its literature consists of poetical and theological compositions, and of many chronicles. The population is almost entirely Mahomedan and uses the Arabic character.

The influence of Portuguese on this language is not very large, and must have been due directly or indirectly to Malay. The Portuguese had constant relations, as a rule hostile, with the Achinese who in the 16th and 17th centuries represented the most powerful indigenous power in Sumatra.³

This ode is published in d'Orta's book and contains an eloquent address to the Viceroy. Among other things he says of him that perhaps his thoughts are busy with pernicious war (guerra infesta) or with bloody Taprobanic Achen, the scourge of the sea (sanguinolento Taprobanico Achem, que o mar molesta). This reference to Achen bears witness to the hostile relations between it and the Portuguese in the 6th century. It is also interesting as proof of the fact that Camoens like many other educated men in his age identified Taprobana of the Greeks in this passage with Sumatra and not with Ceylon.—Ed.]

32. Batta

Batta or Batak is another language of Sumatra which is spoken by a people, pagan and given to cannibalism, and, yet not entirely uncivilised, who are now becoming Mahommedans and Christians.¹ They have a literature both in prose and verse and a character of their own; they write from bottom to top and from left to right.

Cust mentions three dialects of it: Dairi, Toba, and Mandailung. Joustra adds to it Karo, without furnishing much information regarding it.

The influence of Portuguese on this language, which some think has a resemblance to ancient Javanese and others to Malay, is not very great and appears to have been wholly exercised by way of Malay, though the Portuguese had commercial and political intercourse with the country.² The words which I have set down as adopted into Batta, belong properly speaking to Karo according to the dictionary of Joustra.

33. Sundanese³

Sundanese is the language of the west of Java and probably the ancient language of the island and belongs to the Javanese group. It has no ancient literature. It employs Javanese characters, but in a smaller number, and at the same time the Roman. From its geographical position and the structure of its words it approximates more to Malay than to Javanese, and that is why I mention it before the latter.

³ See especially Rigg, A Dictionary of the Sunda Language.

The influence of Portuguese on its vocabulary, which is purer than that of other languages which are allied to it, is both direct and indirect as in the case of Javanese. There existed in Sunda a large Portuguese colony of which Fernão Pinto and other writers make frequent mention.

34. J a v a n e s e

‘From the linguistic standpoint, Javanese is without doubt the most important of all the Malayo-Polynesian group. It is spoken by many millions of men, belonging to a tribe which occupies unquestionably the first place among the peoples of the Archipelago in development and civilisation. This language, which extends towards the centre of the island of Java as well as towards the east, is distinguished by the copiousness of its vocabulary and its forms, as well as by the richness of its literature.’ Heyligers.

It has three principal dialects : High Javanese—a ceremonial dialect ; Low Javanese—the popular dialect ; Middle Javanese—the colloquial dialect. There also exists a poetic form of language, called Kavi, which is charged with Sanskrit terms. The foreign ingredients in the language are the same as in the Malay. Its characters are derived from the Indian, but are much modified and complicated.

It is true the Portuguese never conquered the island but, all the same, they visited its harbours very often and maintained political and commercial relations with it. It is by this means and by the contact of other languages, principally Low Malay, that many Portuguese terms found their way into Javanese.

Some of these as the result of special evolution passed into Krama or High Javanese, in harmony with the nature of the dialect.

35. M a d u r e s e .

Madurese is the indigenous language of the island of Madura and of the immigrants who have been established for centuries in the eastern part of Java. It is spoken by about a million and a half and it uses the Javanese alphabet for writing. Its structure is simpler than that of Javanese but its enunciation is more difficult and ruder. It has one dialect, the Sumanap, besides some peculiar forms of the colloquial language.

It appears that the Portuguese did not have much intercourse with the island and that the introduction of the Portuguese vocables into it is due principally to Javanese and to Low Malay. Even so, the number of Portuguese words that are to be found in it is considerable and generally these retain the Javanese form.

36. Balinese¹

Balinese is the sole language of the island of Bali. It is spoken by about 500,000 people whose religion is still Brahmanical and Buddhist imported from Java and much perverted. According to Cust, the language is more polished than the Sundanese and Madurese. It is generally written on palm leaves in Javanese characters. Its vocabulary betrays traces of Sanskrit through Kavi (the poetic diction of Java), of Javanese, and of Malay. The lower classes speak a dialect which is purer and free from loan words.

In the dictionaries published by the Dutch we find very few Portuguese words, and these too owe their existence in it to mediate influences. But it is likely that there are more of such.

37. Dayak

Dayak or Dyak is the chief of the twelve languages of the extensive island of Borneo. It is also the generic name of the purely indigenous population which is pagan. On the coasts are settled Malays, Javanese, Bugis, and Chinese. The language is an uncultivated one and has neither a literature nor an alphabet.

The Portuguese had a factory at Borneo (1590–1643). But the Portuguese vocables in this language appear to have found their way chiefly through Malay and other allied tongues. When we consider the way these have been transmitted and the scale of the civilisation of the people and of the language wherein they have been admitted, we must confess that the number of the words thus introduced is remarkable.

38. Macassar¹

Macassar is the language of the southern part of the Celebes Island which is called by the same name, and belongs to a special group.² It is a language that is cultivated, has a literature, and its own characters, preserving the classification of the Devanagri.

In its glossary of words there figure many Malay, Javanese, Sundanese, Chinese, and Arabic terms. It is thus through the agency of Malay and Javanese as well as through direct influence, principally religious,³ which was very intense that Portuguese words⁴ found their way into it.

Bugui⁵

Bugui or Vugui (Bugi or Wugi) is another important language of the Celebes, very much resembling Macassar, and which, according to Cust, has exerted an influence upon the languages of the other islands. It has a copious vocabulary in which many Arabic words have found their way through the influence of Mahommedanism; it has also a rich literature, ancient and

³ See Diogo do Couto, Dec. V, VII, 2.

⁴ It is not known when and by whom the Portuguese terms belonging to the card game of quadrille were introduced; they are not to be met with in any other of the languages except this and in Bugui.

modern, and also an archaic language. Its alphabet is the same as that of the Macassar.

The influence of Portuguese on Bugui must have been both direct and indirect, as in the case of Macassar. The large number of words of Portuguese origin, some of which cannot be traced in the other Malayo-Polynesian languages is a proof of the extensive and deep-seated influence of Portuguese civilisation in these parts.

Note.—There are many other languages belonging to different groups of the Archipelago, but I have no materials to enable me to investigate them. It is possible to conjecture from the allied languages that are treated in this work, that even in such, provided they are not entirely the speech of savages cut off from all contact with civilisation, Portuguese words must have found a way, especially such as are in common use, and which have no equivalents in the vernaculars.

40. Nicobarese

Nicobarese, the language of the Nicobar group of islands, is connected in respect of its present-day structure with the Malayo-Polynesian family of languages, but its substratum is provided by another language now extinct. With regard to this older language Sir Grierson says, 'It must be admitted that at the bottom of the languages spoken by the Kols, of the language of the Mon-Khmers and of the Nicobarese and Orang Utans, there is a common substratum which in the case, at least of the Mon-Khmers and the Nicobarese, inasmuch as it shows clear vestiges of its existence, was superimposed by a language belonging to a family of languages entirely different.'

Nicobarese is not a cultivated language, and has no characters of its own ; but it has a variety of dialects, which vary according to the islands and their people.

The Portuguese must have often touched at these islands on their voyages from India and Ceylon to Malacca and must have handed over to them many of their terms, such as rei (king), chumbo (lead), sal (salt), lebre (hare), cabra (goat), which are not to be found in the other languages.¹ The others which are met with in Nicobarese must have found their way in a great measure through Malay. Again there were Catholic missions on these islands during the 17th century.

41. Teto²

The Portuguese colony of Timor has an indigenous population of a million, which is composed of Malay new-comers, and the aboriginal negritos. They speak in the country five languages or principal dialects which are very closely related and having local variations: they are, Teto, Galoli, Uaima, Macaque, and Midic.³

Teto is the one generally used over the island⁴; it is an uncultivated language and possesses neither a literature nor its own alphabet. The speech of Dili, which is the capital city differs from the language of the interior as much in its vocabulary as in its structure and syntax.⁵

⁴ It is spoken in Dili, Viqueque, Luca, Lachute, Alas, Suai, Monofahi, Berique, Dotic, Bibiquçu, Samoro, Batugadi, Sanir, Balibó, Cova, Joanilo, Silacan, and Fialaran.

⁶ 'The dialect which is spoken in Delly, which is Teto or Tetum, is understood over all the island; nevertheless the Teto spoken in Lachute and in other parts is very different from that dialect.' José dos Santos Vaquinhas, Timor, in Journal, Geo. Soc. of Lisbon; 4th ser., p. 276.

Timor being a Portuguese possession and Teto, a very poor language, it is obvious that its vocabulary is laden with Portuguese terms, which are current in a lesser or greater degree, according to the extent of the contact of the peoples with European civilisation. I do not mention in this work all the Portuguese words that find a place in dictionaries of Teto or Galoli, many of which are entered evidently to make up for the want of the corresponding vernacular terms; but I am finding a place for such in their respective indices.

42. Galoli¹

Galoli is the other principal language or dialect of Timor. With regard to it says Rev. Alves da Silva: 'It is the dialect most employed by the Christian population to the north-east of Timor, that part of Malaysia which is the most loyal and faithful to the Portuguese crown. In the language too of this part there is a noticeable difference though not quite so perceptible; thus it comes about that this dialect spoken in Manatuto though understood in Laleia and Vemasse, presents certain variations which are noticeable as far as in Lacle, although this latter place is almost two hours distant from the former.'

The influence of Portuguese on this language is analogous to that exercised on Teto. In the dictionary of this language there are fewer Portuguese words² to be found than in that of Teto.

43. Malagasy³

From its geographical position the island of Madagascar, 'the Island of St. Lorenzo' of the old Portuguese writers, belongs to Africa ; but its ethnic and linguistic affinities are with Asia.¹ It is on this account that Cust includes Malagasy, which is the language spoken in the island, in his 'Languages of the East Indies'.² Its population is about two millions and a half and it is divided among numerous tribes which differ from one another in their physical appearance, the result of a mixture in a greater or smaller degree of the African with the Malay, Arab, or Indian.³ But all speak a common language, which has ten dialects, of which the Hova is the chief and the one that is understood by the bulk of the population.⁴ It has no peculiar character, and therefore commonly employs the Roman.

The affinity of Malagasy to the Malayo-Polynesian Language Family was observed four centuries ago and has now been confirmed by the investigations in modern times of Van der Tuuck, Marre, Marin, and W. E. Cousins.⁵ But the roots of the words

² 'This island of San Lourenço, which writers call Madagascar All this island is inhabited by peoples not as black as the negroes, nor as fair as the Mohammedans of all that coast. The presumption is that this island was conquered by the Jáos (Javanese) and that the inhabitants are a half breed people, the result of the fusion of the conquerors with the former natives of the country who must have been the Caffres (negroes) from the other side of the mainland.' Diogo do Couto, Dec. VII, IV, 5.

⁴ 'The language in use all over is Buque, . . . and it is so uniform all over the island that the natives from the southernmost point understand it just as well as those from the northernmost ; its vocabulary is poor, but on that account as easy to learn as to pronounce.' Rev. Mariano, op. cit., p. 353.

are not bisyllabic as in the languages of the Archipelago. All the words end in a vowel, especially in a and i.

In its vocabulary there are to be found many exotic words chiefly English,¹ which are due to the intense Protestant missionary activity in the island, and French words which have been introduced, thanks to the influence of the Catholic religion and its missionary labours.

The Portuguese visited many times the ports of Madagascar, to which they gave names derived from the Calendar of the Saints ; but they had no frequent or permanent relations of a political or commercial nature with the island. From Goa were despatched to it expeditions of a politico-religious kind, but without any serious result ; and the missionary labours started by the Jesuits were of short duration and not very fruitful of results.² Among the Romanic words adopted in Malagasy, it is difficult to distinguish those which owe their existence to the mediate or direct influence of Portuguese, the presumption as a rule being in favour of French or English as the channels of entry.³

44. Pidgin-English⁴

In the coast cities of China is spoken a dialect of English which serves as a means of oral communication, like the corrupt Portuguese dialect in former days, between the natives and the European and American foreigners, and sometimes even among the Chinese themselves who speak very different dialects.

'In its first and low form,' says Leland, 'as it is given in the vocabularies published for the use of servants, Pidgin is a very rude jargon, in which English words singularly mutilated, owing to the difficulty of expressing their sounds in written Chinese, are set forth according to the rules of the Chinese grammar. In fact, it is a translation, word by word, with little effort at inflection or conjugation, in view of the fact that such grammatical forms, as we understand them, do not exist in Chinese. The result of this, naturally, is that the vocabulary being very limited, a Chinaman learns Pidgin-English with no more difficulty than is presented by the acquisition of a few hundred words, whose pronunciation and grammar have been modified to accommodate themselves to his own language. In this it resembles exactly posh an posh or the corrupt Romany dialect spoken by the Gipsies in England in which Hindi-Persian words follow English grammatical structure.¹

It is owing to the facility with which the Chinese learn this dialect and the good will of the foreigners to go and meet them half-way, that it has spread to such an incredible extent, thus preparing the ground to make English the language of the Pacific. And as the Chinaman learns more easily a Romanic language than pure English, it is probable that were it not for the Pidgin jargon, corrupt Portuguese would have formed the popular means of communication between the foreigners and the natives of China—the large number of Portuguese words which at present exist in Pidgin-English appears to prove it.'

The word pidgin is supposed to be a corruption of the English word business, but with a meaning much more extensive and varied. And as commerce is the one great bond between the Chinese and the foreigners residing in the country, it is not to be wondered at that the term came to be applied to denote the language that was evolved for the purposes of trade.

There are those, however, who think that 'pidgin' is derived from the Portuguese 'ocupação.'¹

45. Japanese²

Students of languages are not agreed upon the genealogical classification of the language of Japan, the Yamato. Some try to trace an affinity between it and Aryan; others conclude that it has sprung from the Ural-Altaic stock, and that it is akin to the Korean, Manchu and Mongolian. There are again others who regard the Japanese language, just as much as the race itself, as a distinct one.

Morphologically, Japanese is agglutinative and polysyllabic. The ordinary colloquial language is very different from the written and the literary, in which are to be found many Chinese terms.³ In its vocabulary are met with various Sanskrit, or rather, Pali words, introduced by Buddhism.⁴

³ 'The primitive language of Nippon, the Yamato-Kotôba, must have been necessarily very poor in vocables; and it appears certain that the earliest Japanese were completely ignorant of the use of writing. With the successive and growing intercourse of Japan with China, about the 3rd century of our era, Yamato-Kotôba began to be enriched with Chinese words, though such an alliance might now appear strange; it was then that the art of giving graphic form to an idea was started.' Wenceslau de Morais, op. cit.

The dialectical differences which are noticeable in different localities are of minor importance and do not stand comparison with those that are to be found in China. The dialect of the group of islands, known as Riukiu, deserves especial mention inasmuch as it preserves its archaic character. The speech of the Aino tribes of the island of Spezo is totally different from pure Japanese and is therefore not understood by the people of the other islands.

In their writing they generally employ Chinese ideographs, which run to about 3,000 in number. The proper Japanese script is syllabic made up of 47 syllables,¹ and is known as Kana, of which there are two varieties: the Katakana and Hiragana. Japanese is written in vertical columns from the right to the left. Its literature goes as far back as the 7th century.²

Portugal was the first European nation which came into contact with Japan and for a long period maintained commercial and missionary relations with it. It left, as in almost every other part, indelible traces of its language in the vocabulary of Japan most of which were due to the introduction of new objects and of a new religion. Some of the terms have acquired such citizen rights that it is difficult to trace their foreign origin. The ancient books of the Japanese abound, according to the testimony of Dr. Murakami, in religious terms of foreign origin and only a few of these have entered into the common speech of the people.³

³ Dr. Murakami, Director of the School for Foreign Languages in Tokio, was kind enough to send me a list of such terms which he had not published in his work to which I have referred above. In recent times many English words have been introduced as also words which, though not English, have found their way into the language through English, such as: alcali, alcool, blanket, butter,

46. Persian¹

Persian has passed through various phases. The primitive Iranian had two principal dialects : Iranian of the West or ancient Persian, written in cuneiform characters, the most ancient inscriptions dating from the time of Darius ; and Iranian of the East, confirmed by Avest and written in an alphabet of Aramaic origin. The middle form of ancient Persian is preserved in the Pahlavi inscriptions, the earliest of which date as far back as the 3rd century of the Christian era. Literary Persian makes its appearance with the Mussulman dynasties in the 9th century. Modern Persian, especially the written language, is full of Arabic terms ; there is no word of this origin which has not or could not have a place in its vocabulary. Its alphabet is Arabic with slight modifications. But its structure remains Iranian.

Persian was in great vogue in India during the period of the Mahommedan domination ; it was the language of the court, of the tribunals of justice, and of the official and literary world. The first digest of Hindu Law compiled under the orders of Warren Hastings—The Gentoo Code—was translated from the Sanskrit into Persian and from this rendered into English. Many of the English officials found themselves under the necessity, even during the last century, of knowing Persian² ; and even at the present day there are schools where Persian is taught in various parts of the country. The treaties which the Portuguese entered into with Mahommedan sovereigns were recorded in Portuguese and in Persian.³

47. Arabic

There are very many works treating of the Arabic influence on the Spanish languages but very few dealing with the influence of the Spanish languages on Arabic. The reason for this must certainly lie in the fact that the influence of the languages of the Iberic peninsula upon the language of the Mahommedan conquerors was neither so intense, nor lasting nor general. The most important work on this subject known to me is that of Simonet ; but it does not appear to be a safe guide because many of the terms, which he sets down as having been taken over from Spain by the Arabs, had, one is inclined to suspect, a different origin and a limited range.

Arabic is the sacred language of the Mahommedans of India where there are schools in which it is taught. But very few Portuguese words must have been introduced into it by this way. Those that I have recorded in the present work are only such as belong to Eastern Arabic and not to that which is in use in Africa, which has many more. Even these do not offer, generally speaking, a sure clue to their Portuguese origin. Lexicographers refer many of them, as I have noted in various instances, to Greek, Latin, French, and Italian sources. Arabic and Persian, therefore, occupy in my work a secondary place.

48. Other Languages

Besides the languages already referred to, there are a few others whose vocabularies were not the direct object of my investigations : they are the Chinese, Jewish, Turkish, and the languages of the Philippines. The dictionaries of the other languages which I waded through, incidentally mentioned some Romanic words which are found in these vocabularies. But few of these are, for certain, of Portuguese origin as leilão and padre are in the Chinese language ; the other Romanic words may have had a different origin. Those that are to be found in Tagalo and Bisaio must have been introduced therein directly from the Spanish. Romanic words in the Turkish and Jewish languages are reproduced from the Glossary of Simonet. Subject to this reservation such terms will be found in the present work.

Andamanese : I examined two dictionaries of the unclassified languages of the Andaman Islands,¹ and did not come across any Portuguese word in either of them ; this is because no foreign word has been included in them and thus the words sabão (soap), mesa (table), tabaco (tobacco), etc. have been omitted. As the Andamanese were uncivilized, it is to be presumed that some Portuguese words entered into their speech by way of Hindustani and English as has happened in analogous cases.²

XIV. Alphabets and their Transliteration ³

It is now an accepted fact among Sanskritists, after the palæographic investigations of Dr. Bühler, that the art of writing was known in India in the 8th century B.C., although it was not then nor much afterwards employed for literary purposes. The characters are of Semitic origin and belong to the Phœnician type, similar to the Moabite, introduced by traders by way of Mesopotamia. The most ancient documents which we possess are the stone-inscriptions of the Emperor Asoka (3rd century B.C.) which give variants of the different forms of letters.

³ See Beames, Comparative Grammar of the Modern Aryan Languages of India. Caldwell, A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Languages. Arthur Macdonell, A History of Sanskrit Literature. Friedrich Ballhorn, Alphabete orientalischer und occidentalischer Sprachen. G. Bühler, On the Origin of the Indian Brahma Alphabet.

The remodelling, the systematisation, and the adaptation of the Semitic characters to the Indo-European phonetics resulted in the alphabet which is called Brahmi and this in the 5th century. And it is from this that all the modern alphabets of India are derived, even the Dravidian, though these might appear so different at the present day. The most important of the derived alphabets is the Nagari (the city alphabet) or Devanagri (that of the city of God) in which are chiefly inscribed the literary monuments of the Sanskrit language and which in its written form dates as far back as the 8th century B.C.

The following languages follow Devanagri : Hindi, Nepali, Bihari, and Kashmiri ; Sindhi and Hindustani use this as well as the Arabic-Persian characters ; then Marathi, Konkani only partially, and Guzarati make use of this script. Punjabi, Bengali, Oriya, Assamese, Sinhalese, Telugu, Kanarese, with Tulu and Malayalam, have their peculiar characters, which differ from the Devanagri in their form but not phonetically or in their arrangement. Many of these languages, however, do not use all the Devanagri sounds, and there are some that have one or other especial sound or additional sounds and letters.

Among the Dravidian languages only the Tamil alphabet differs a great deal from the Nagri, as much owing to the want of many letters as by the addition of some consonants, and, even more, owing to the use of certain consonants to convey two or three different sounds.

The Arab-Persian characters are employed by Hindustani, Sindhi, with a special system of diacritical marks, Malay and Achinese.

Burmese, Tibetan, Siamese, Kambojan, Batta, Javanese, as well as Sundanese and Balinese and Madurese use their own characters, derived from the Aryan script, but a great deal modified. The alphabet of Bugui and Macassar have been co-ordinated according to the Devanagri system.

Garo, Khassi, Dayak, Nicobarese, Teto, Galoli, Malagasy, and to a partial extent, Konkani, Low Malay, and Sundanese, use the Roman alphabet. Annamite, Tonkinese, and Japanese employ the Chinese ideographs.¹

The Congress of Orientalists, which took place in 1894 at Geneva, adopted as regards Devanagari a uniform system of transcription, which since then has been generally followed by Sanskritists. The same system can be, and it is desirable should be, used for the transliteration of other alphabets which have the same origin, with a especial notation which is easily understood for especial letters.

It is necessary, therefore, to understand, above all, the transliteration of the Devanagari alphabet and likewise those of Tamil and Arabic-Persian.

Remarks

I. A has the sound of a neutral vowel or small α. In Konkani and in Bengali it approximates to ø short. A, i, u, r, l are short (= ă, ĕ, ŭ, ĭ, Ĺ); ā, ī, ū, ṛ, are long. The vowels, r, ṛ, l are especial to Sanskrit vocables. E and o are regarded as diphthongs in Sanskrit (originally āi and āu) and as such are long and closed (= ê, ô).

¹ The Rev. J. Knowles maintains that 'the alphabets of the Indian Empire reach the total of fifty—a greater number than those of the languages of the world, ancient and modern taken together.'

II. In the Dravidian and in some of the Neo-Aryan languages e and o are short and long. I represent them as ē and ō when long and unstressed. Sinhalese has in addition e diphthong (=æ), short and long, much palatalised. I transliterate it generally as ē and ē̄, or better, as ē̃ and ē̄̃. Konkani has e and o open and closed; I represent them when necessary by é and ó when open and accented, and by ê and ô when closed. The Dravidian languages have many terminations ending in u very short, which it is usual to represent by u or ụ. Grammarians, according to Caldwell, give to such a quarter of the length of a long vowel.

III. Many of the Neo-Aryan languages do not pronounce the short a at the end of a word and frequently also not when it occurs in the middle of a word, although they write the consonant whole (without the virāma) as though the vowel was a part of it. Thus they write रर Rāma, but pronounce it Rām. In such cases I drop the a in transliteration.

IV. The Dravidian and many of the Neo-Aryan languages have the sound as well as the letter ऌ la cerebral, which in Sanskrit is only to be met with in Vedic writings.

V. Konkani, Marathi, and Telugu have two letters with two distinct sounds each of them, without any graphic sign to distinguish the phonetic changes; the normal (before e and i) ch explosive (like the Italian c before e and i) and ts almost equivalent to zz in Italian; j explosive (as in English) and z (or dz).¹ I have marked the difference when transcribing such sounds.

VI. For very especial and weighty reasons I have made the following alterations in the rules for the transliteration mentioned above: ch, chh, I represent by c, ch; x (palatal) by ç (or ś) and ṣ; I have employed n, as a rule, not only to convey the sound of the nasal dental consonant, but also the guttural ṇ and the palatal ṅ. All the nasals, when they figure in the middle of a word and unaccompanied by a vowel, are commonly represented in Neo-Aryan script by a full point (anusvāra) placed over the preceding letter like the dot in Portuguese ; and they are distinguished phonetically by the consonant which follows as in Konkani : aṅg for aṅ, vāṁjh for vāñjh, phāṁt for phānt, dāṁt for dant, ximpī for ximp̄.

VII. In almost all the polysyllabic languages the accent falls on the ultimate syllable if it be long and on the penultimate, long or short, if the ultimate be short. But in Sinhalese the accent can precede the penultimate, even though it be short as in annásiya=pineapple.¹ I have pointed out the exceptions by the acute accent when the vowel is long, by an accent and the short sign when the vowel is short.

Letters for Sanskrit sounds : ஷ sh, ஸ s, ஹ h, ஃ ḥ.

Remarks.

I. The Dravidian alphabet is also syllabic ; a dot on the consonant, equivalent to the Sanskrit virāma, is an indication of the absence of the short a which accompanies it.

II. Tamil has no aspirate sounds, nor especial letters for soft consonants ; one and the same character serves to mark both the sounds.

² See Caldwell, op. cit., Percival, Tamil-English Dictionary.

III. K, ch, t, t, p, being medial and simple, that is, when not double, sound as g, j (very little used in vernacular words), ḍ, d, b. Ḥh initial, and even intervocalic, is represented at times by the unstressed x or the Sanskrit ś or ç; the same is also used to mark the sibilant dental s. I transcribe ch, j, and s, but not x which is not much used. The d intervocalic in Tamil and Malayalam is very soft like th in English in than, that. I am not differentiating it from simple d, nor does Caldwell make a difference between them. In foreign words there occur high sounding initial syllables.

IV. The Tamil rule regarding sonorous medials is likewise observed in Malayalam, but with distinct letters, except k medial which sounds like g weak, almost like h, and is transliterated by a special sign which I omit.

V. The consonants peculiar to this language are ḷ, ṛ, ṇ. The first which also occurs in Malayalam 'is pronounced differently in different districts,' says Caldwell. According to this writer the normal sound of this resembles the English r in farm, more liquid and post-palatal. According to Percival it is a mixture of r, l, and of the French j. Telugu substitutes it by ḍ cerebral and modern Kanarese by ḷ cerebral.

VI. The ṛ hard, at present used in Tamil and Malayalam, has a sound which is midway between the cerebrals ḍ and ḷ as in the English crack.

VII. N, the last letter of the alphabet, is not differentiated phonetically from the n dental; it has, on this account, no discriminating mark.

VIII. Some of the vowels shade off into different sounds before certain consonants which I find unnecessary to describe. The diphthong ai occurs but rarely.¹

¹ The Dravidian languages generally retain the tonic accent of Portuguese words in the syllable on which it falls.

Remarks

I. Many of the above-mentioned letters take different forms when they are at the beginning, middle or at the end of a word. I do not describe them because they do not affect the transliteration.

II. The letters th, h, s, z, (ḍ), t, z, ʿ, q, are peculiar to Arabic. Kh, dh, z, gh, are common both to Arabic and Persian. The letter zh is peculiar to Persian. P, ch, g, are common to Persian and Hindustani. The cerebrals t, ḍ, r, are peculiar to Hindustani.

III. Some of the Arabic letters have a different sound in Persian and Hindustani as : th = s ; dh = z ; ḍ = Hindust. z ; t, z = Hindust. t, z.

IV. The Congress of Orientalists, referred to above, likewise standardised the transliteration of the Arabic alphabet, and this I am following, showing however, a preference for such variations as are left to option. I am substituting ḍ for z to avoid confusion with the Hindustani ḍ, and w for v to maintain harmony with the transliteration from the Devanagari alphabet.

V. As Simonet and other authors adopt various methods of transcription which they do not always explain, I am making use of different Arabic words employed by them without adhering strictly or even uniformly to the method of the Congress.

VI. Malay does not use in its vernacular speech the following Arabic letters : th, h, kh, z, sh, s, q, t, z, ' , gh, f, and employs the following in addition to those which it has from the Arabic : ch, ng, p, g, ñ, or ny.

VII. Dutch writers in accordance with the genius of their language transliterate the letters ch, j, and ñ from Malay and the other languages of the Archipelago by tj, dj, and nj, and these they pronounce exactly as in Devanagiri. 'Ch is always pronounced as ch in church'. Swettenham. 'Or like the Spanish word muchacho'. Favre. 'J ought to be pronounced as in jury, justice, jew'. Rigg. 'Ñ is pronounced as gn in agneau; it is the Spanish ñ'. Favre.¹

¹ 'The Dutch language does not contain this sound (ch), and it is consequently represented by them by tj, which does not convey the sound even according to the Dutch use of letters, as j with them has the power of the English y. It rather conveys the force of the French letters so applied.' Rigg.

OPINION OF SENHOR A. R. GONÇALVES VIANA ON THE WORK IN MANUSCRIPT, 'INFLUENCE OF PORTU-GUESE VOCABLES ON ASIATIC LANGUAGES', OF DR. SEBASTIÃO RODOLFO DALGADO.

Monsignor Sebastião Rodolfo Dalgado presents to our Academy a study very comprehensive in its extent which, I am not sure whether any other scholar, Portuguese or for that matter of any other nationality, could have satisfactorily accomplished.

The subject of this laborious work is the examination specific and systematic of Portuguese words adopted in a great number of Asiatic languages spoken by peoples with whom we have been in more or less intimate and direct contact. In respect of time this contact has been extended from the 15th century to the present day, and in respect of extent has covered the zone right from Ceylon to Japan. This work represents specialisation in a field of linguistic study for which its worthy author had not the benefit of an earlier model. He had therefore, in the carrying out of his objective, himself to evolve a new method adapted to an exposition at once clear and convincing. The truth is that uptil now, orientalisists, by which I mean those who make a scientific study of these questions, have preferred to devote their time to investigate the origin of exotic vocables of varying provenance which have made their entry into European languages, and not to examine the influence which these latter have exercised over the vernaculars of the other parts of the world.

The author fully equipped for his task by continuous study and by a thorough assimilation of the exact laws of comparative philology, shows in every detail of his work a knowledge of scientific literature pertinent to his subject and a conscientious grasp of those facts which help effectively to make good his thesis, viz. the considerable influence of Portuguese civilisation in its various manifestations over indigenous civilisation, whether stationary or progressive. So large, in fact, is the number of Portuguese words adopted in so many languages distinct in their genius, seeing that they belong to diverse families and possessing the most varied grammatical structures, that we cannot help inferring that excluding the Greeks and the Romans perhaps no other people, unless they be the Arabs, succeeded in spreading a part of its vocabulary through so many diverse language fields, and this without affecting the integrity of these languages, no matter whether the words found an entry into these tongues through the spoken word or through written compositions, above all liturgical.

With regard to the grouping of the vernacular languages, the learned and worthy orientalist follows the system employed by the renowned English glotologist Robert Cust, well-known for his model of a book—‘The Modern Languages of the East Indies,’ not to speak of other works. I am of the opinion that he acted well in doing this, notwithstanding that the classification and its characteristics are not in complete agreement with the theories of the celebrated philologist, the late Frederick Müller, some of which are perhaps antiquated while others are too personal, and in spite of differing from the most recent doctrines and theories put forward by Finck with regard to grammatical structures which has reduced from a morphological standpoint to eight types all the languages known in the five continents of the world.

I hold that in deciding to follow Cust the choice was most happy in relation, at least, to the Asiatic languages, which was the sole field of the author’s investigations.

I have already mentioned that Monsignor Dalgado, in the absence of any existing model for his work or of one even resembling it to guide him, had to set up a method entirely new. In fact, if we put aside some of the studies of Dr. Hugo Schuchardt on the Portuguese dialects in Asia, one of Aristides Marre and two of mine regarding Malay, the first of which was published in 1896 in the memorial volume 'Mélanges Charles de Harlez', and the second in the eighth volume of the 'Revista Lusitana' (1903-1905), preceded by an incomplete investigation of Dr. A. A. Fokker and also of Dr. Murakámi, which aims at tracing the various Portuguese or Spanish words still to be found in the Japanese of to-day, all the other languages of India, those of the Far East, of the south of Asia and of Polynesia had to be examined with reference to the question in hand, the absorption of Portuguese terms in these vernacular tongues.

The author does not expound the phonetic laws to which each of the languages conformed in accepting the Portuguese words and fusing them into their own vocabulary, as I attempted to do in the case of words in Malay, a task easy enough, considering the phonetic simplicity of the family of languages, to which Portuguese words had no difficulty in conforming.

On the other hand, a study of all the changes which these words had to undergo in the idioms of the other linguistic families would require arduous and sustained labour if it were to come within the four corners of the work which I am here surveying. Meanwhile the learned writer has pointed out in a concise manner some of the principal changes and among them the most notable is that which has reference to the elimination of the initial atonic syllable which immediately precedes a tonic syllable in a polysyllabic word, specially if the initial syllable should be a vowel, but also, in some cases if it should be a consonant. This phenomenon is well-known and is frequently to be met with when words of one language make their way into another, and if the transmission should be consequent on the result of hearing the spoken word.

This valuable study which has been entrusted to me for examination is preceded by an introduction which, looked at from whatever point of view is of very great interest. In it the author discloses his extensive learning in this very important branch of knowledge. This introduction is elaborated out with such art, as to make an appeal as much to the specialist as to the ordinary reader keen on being informed, so clear and delightful is his exposition, its strictly scientific character however, being in no way affected by his extraordinary conciseness both of treatment and expression.

In the whole work the author has employed Portuguese vernacular idioms with the most meticulous care and has avoided the use of even pardonable neologisms or words that betray their foreign descent ; the unique exception is the case of certain ethnic names, such as khmer, cashmirês, which in my opinion could have been reduced to our systems of orthography and written as cmer, caxemirês like the others to which the author skilfully gave a Portuguese guise. The result in consequence is, that he has imparted an atmosphere truly national to the whole of his work, which because of its worth and originality does much honour to our scientific attainments in a field of human knowledge, which unfortunately among us has but few scholars of eminence though it must be said that these are held everywhere in great respect and regard.

It is on this account that the work, as I have said, is of the greatest interest, not only to us Portuguese, as testifying to our enduring interest, in distant nations and peoples with whom we had been and are in contact, but as much also for those outside Portugal, who with great honour and distinction give themselves up to linguistic studies in their multifarious aspects.

I feel certain that the publication of this monumental study will receive the approbation and applause of scholars of all nations dedicated to this branch of learning, and from the public in general, and that it will redound to the glory of our country; to the well-merited honour of our Academy, and above all to the credit of him who with the greatest selflessness and dedication, a spirit truly scientific, and burning patriotism, took upon himself to carry out in an exemplary manner a work so well conceived and so useful and withal so difficult and one which belongs to a field of knowledge which till now has scarcely been explored.

In view of all these reasons I am of the opinion that the masterly study of which I have just finished making a succinct analysis satisfies all the requirements necessary to have its publication sanctioned at the cost of the Academy of Sciences, Lisbon and I feel sure that its publication will enhance the reputation which our Academy has ever earned and upheld.

ASIATIC LANGUAGES.

Abada (old Port. 'rhinoceros, female rhinoceros'¹). Anglo-Ind. abada (obs.)—|Indo-Fr. abada|.

The origin of the word is doubtful. Two derivations are put forward: the Arabic ābida, 'a wild animal'; and the Malay bādaq, (the q scarcely pronounced), 'a rhinoceros.' The latter appears more probable. There is no mention of the term in Portugal before the sixteenth century and the early Portuguese chroniclers mention it as an Indian or Malay word, and also use the form *bada*². Duarte Barbosa and João de Barros employ the Indian term ganda, instead of abada.¹ The proper term for a rhinoceros in Arabic-Persian is karkaddan.

(1569), in Jour. Geo. Soc. Lib., 4th ser., p. 547.

"Rhinoceros or Badas." João de Lucena, Historia da Vida do Padre Francisco de Xavier, Bk. X, ch. 18.

1 "He (The King of Guzerate) sent a Ganda ('rhinoceros') to the King our Lord, as they told him he would be pleased with it." Duarte Barbosa, Livro, ed. of the Academy of Sciences, Lisbon, p. 263. [Hak. Soc., ed. Longworth Dames, Vol. I, p. 124. Lord Stanley of Alderley who was the first to translate and edit Barbosa for the Hakluyt Society thought the ganda of this passage meant "a woman of the Gond tribe." Col. Henry Yule in Hobson-Jobson (s. v. ganda) remarks that this annotation of Sir Stanley is "a marvel in the way of error."]

"A big animal.....with a horn right above the nose, two spans long, thick at the base and pointed at the end; the inhabitants of Cambay whence this creature came call it Ganda: and the Greeks, and Latins Rhinoceros." João de Barros, Dec. II, x, 1

1 "The rhinoceros, which are the abadas." Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino, Itinerario da Índia, I, p. 79.

2 "Many bring from the 'Cape of Currents' to Moçambique skins of tigers and of other big game, and from the same place come horns which they wish to say are equal to those of the Abada of Malacca." P. Monclaio

[The meaning and origin of this word has been fruitful of much discussion. Yule and Burnell (Hobson-Jobson, s. v. abada) observe that "more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries (Portuguese) the word is feminine." Crooke in the 1903 ed. quotes, in support of the above view, a suggestion of W. W. Skeat that "the female was the more dangerous animal, or the one most frequently met with, as is certainly the case with the crocodile." The plain fact of the matter is that in Portuguese the gender of a substantive is one thing and the sex another. Abada is a feminine substantive in Portuguese like many such ending in a: zêbra, girafa, gazela, and denotes the species as also the female. The use of the word by the old Portuguese writers is perfectly consistent with this view.

Some hold that, if the original of the word is the Malay bādaq, the elimination of the final consonant has to be accounted for. But Portuguese has calamba ('aloes wood') from Mal. calambaq, and pucho ('the costus of the ancients, the fragrant root of the Saussurea Xappe') from Mal. puchug. Again, the initial a of abada though not found in the Malay original may have been due to the agglutination of the Portuguese article a, an instance of which we have in the English 'alligator' from the Spanish el or al lagarto, or what is more likely it may be a case of prosthesis such as we have in the Portuguese words alacre ('lac'), alanterna ('lantern'), atambor ('tambour'). See Dalgado's Contribuições etc., and Glossario Luso—As. s. v. abada, calamba, and pucho, also Hobson-Jobson s. v. calambac, and putchock.]

Abafado (subst., 'a dish of stew'; in the Port. dialects of the East bafado). Konk. bāphād.—Beng. bāphādū. Cf. temperado.

Abano (old Port. and Indo-Port. avano,¹ 'a fan'). Sinh.

avánaya, avánē, aváne; vern. terms pavanpata, pavan-atta, vatā-pata.

Many of the Sinhalese nouns, and especially those derived from foreign sources, which are of the neuter gender, as are all those which denote inanimate objects, take the suffix -ya,—or -va, if they end in -u,—as: gūṇaya ('quality') from the Sansk. guṇa; tālaya ('tone') from the Sansk. tāla; garādaya ('railing') from the Port. grade; sinuva ('bell') from the Port. sino; bēbāduva ('drunkard') from the Port. bēbado. In the middle of a word -ya contracts itself usually in ē long: janēlaya, janēlē (pl. janēla) from the Port. janela ('a window'); kamīsaya, kamīsē (pl. kamīsa) from the Port. camisa ('a shirt').

Ābita (naut., bitts; fixed wooden or iron pin for fastening the cable). L.-Hindust. abīt, habīt.—Mal. abīt (Aristide Marre).

Abóbora (Cucurbita Pepo; a gourd, a pumpkin). Konk. bhobló; bobr (us. in Salsete, a district of Goa). Bhoblí, the plant.—Mar. bhoplá, bhomplá. Bhoplí, bhomplí, the plant.—

Jap. bóbura.—Ar. bobra, bubra, according to Simonet.¹

In Konkani, bhobló is used figuratively of 'a man who is fat and lacking muscle.' In Konkani, as well as in Marathi, the term is used to denote the body of certain stringed instruments, because it is generally made of the gourd hollowed out, as of the viṇā, 'the Indian lyre,' the satar, 'the guitar,' the nāgsūr, 'bagpipe.'

With regard to the bh aspirate, cf. cruz, camisa, buraco. The loss of the initial a is not abnormal, as can be seen in the Indo-Port. bobra; cf. acafelar. The substitution of the cerebral l for r may have resulted from the word having found its way into the speech of the common people, or may also be due to the fact that there is a tendency towards such a change both in Konkani and Marathi. The nasalisation of the first syllable in Marathi (bhō) has parallels in pīmp from the Port. pipa ('barrel'), phint from the Port. fitá ('ribbon').

The etymology of the word abóbora, which is used only in the Iberic Peninsula—and then not in the whole of it—has not till now been definitely established by lexicographers. The Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, says its derivation is uncertain; Dr. Adolfo Coelho is of the opinion that it is from aboborar, 'to turn soft like over ripe fruit'; Cândido de Figueiredo derives it from Low Latin apopres, which does not find a mention in the Glossarium of Du Cange; Francisco Simonet asserts that it is from the Hispano-Latin or Iberic apopores, mentioned by St. Isidore, Bk. XVII, ch. 10, as equivalent to the cucurbita.

If the word was taken over from Portugal, as I believe it was,¹ and introduced into the Konkan country and into Japan, at the same time as the plant, whose place of origin says Dr. D. G. Dalgado in his Flora of Goa and Savantvadi is uncertain, it is remarkable that it should have given rise in Marathi to so many figurative compounds, with different meanings, enumerated by Molesworth, who does not, however, say what the origin of the word is. These are: bhomplá-devatá, "a tom-boy, a hoyden." Bhomplá-suti (adj.), "coarse, gross, rude, rough, disorderly, slovenly." Bhomplí-kharbúz, "a species of musk melon." Bhomplyá-róg, "corpulency, obesity."

There are vernacular terms for the other varieties of the pumpkin: dudhí, konkñó dudhí, mahāró dudhí, kāló dudhí, kumvāló, in Konkani; kovhālá, kuśmaṇḍ, kāśí-phal, dudhyá, kālá dudhyá, devḍan-

In the Portuguese dialects in Asia, abobora is corrupted into bóbra, bovr.

Abril (April). Konk. Ābrīl.—Tet., Gal. Abril.—Mal. April (Marre). See Agosto.

Acabar (to finish). Konk. kabār-karuṅk, kabār-zavuṅk.—Beng. kābār (subst.), the last day of the month. In Hindustani mājīkabār. See mês [also Hobson-Jobson, s. v. mas-cabar.]

In the Indo-Portuguese dialect the initial a of acabar becomes eliminated, whence the form cabá.

Acafelar (to plaster; Indo-Port. has the form caflá). Konk. kāphlār-karuṅk; vern. term chunó-kas kāḍhuṅk.—Guj. ka-phlād (us. as a subst. meaning 'plaster, lime').—Sinh. kapal-āruvā.²—Malayal. kabalarikka ('to bind stones or bricks with a mixture of lime, sand and water') us. in Southern Malabar.³—Mal. kāpor (us. as a subst.).⁴

Konkani adds karuṅk ('to do' or 'to make') to the transitive verbs in Portuguese and zavuṅk ('to become') to the intransitive. The exception is the Konkani form pintāruṅk, 'to paint', from the Port. pintar ('to paint'). The change of f into p is normal in Sinhalese which has no corresponding sound, ph being p aspirate, as in Sanskrit; cf. adufa. In Malayalam, as well as in Tamil, the surd intervocalic consonant (k, t, p) becomes resonant (g, d, b).

Açafrão (saffron; Indo-Port. employs the forms safrão, safran). Guj. jāphran.—Siam. jārān.—Jap. safuran.⁵

indicate the exact pronunciation of Portuguese words, taken over into Malay, nor does he employ any special diacritical marks. He says, "the words are entered here (in his dictionary) not as they are written or joined together, but as they are pronounced."

Achar (an Indo-Port. term used to signify 'fruits conserved in vinegar or salt,' equivalent to the English 'pickles'). Mar. āchār; vern. term lonchēm (as in Konkani).—Hindi, Hindust. achār.—Or., Ass., Punj. āchār.—Sindh. āchāru; vern. names āthāṇō, sāndhaṇō.—Sinh. achchār.—Anglo-Ind. achar.—Indo-Fr. achar, achars.—Mal. āchar.—Tet., Gal achār, asār; vern. term budú.

The word has its origin in the Persian achār; it was probably met with by the Portuguese in the Malay Peninsula and introduced by them into the other languages, directly or indirectly. The authors of Hobson-Jobson think it likely that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria.

It is worthy of note that the term did not find its way into

Konkani, although current in the Portuguese dialect of Goa.¹

Açoitar (to whip). Mal. açotar (Haex).

In Konkani sait is used in the sense of 'a whip,' and saitār-kāḍhuṅk is 'to whip.'

Acudir (to aid, to assist). Mal. cudir (Haex).—Tet., Gal. kudir.

Adem (a duck). Malayal. ádi.—Tet. rádè.

Adeus (adieu). Konk. ādēs; the vern. term in vogue among the Hindus is Rām-Rām, and salām among the Mohammedans. Ādēs karuṅk, 'to bow in token of salutation.'—Tet., Gal. adeus; vern. term bá-ōna.²

O. de Castro, Flores de Coral, p. 137.

² From Ram-Ram Gonçalves Viana derives the Portuguese ramerrão ['onomatopoeic sound suggesting routine or every day affair']. See Apostilas aos Dicionários Portugueses. The same writer admits in Palestras Filológicas that "it is possible that this curious word may have come Adro (church-yard). Konk. adr.—Tamil ádru.

Adufa (lattice, shutter; in the Port. dialect of Goa adufo is also used). Konk. ādúph.—Sinh. adúppuva, adtpuva.

The word is used to denote the window shutters commonly fitted with the shells of the mollusc bhing, and, therefore, called in Konkani bhingatyó or bhingātyó.¹

Advogado (lawyer). Kon. ādvogád (the term more in vogue in this sense is letrád): vern. term vakil (l. us. in Goa).—Tet., Gal. advogádu; vern. term sori.

Afonsa (the name of a variety of the mango-fruit, also known as the 'Alphonso mango'). Konk. āphons, āphonsāchó āmbó.—Mar. aphós.—Guj. aphús.—Anglo-Ind. afoos.

² Other varieties with Portuguese names, which are in vogue only in Goa, are: Bispo, Costa, Doirada, Dom Bernardo, Dom Filipe, Fernandina, Ferrão, Malagesta, Monseratte, Papel Branco, Rebêlo, Reinol, Salgada, Salgadinhx, Santo António, Sacratina, Temuda (in Konkani, Chimbúd), Xavier, Bem-curada, Mal-Curada, etc.

[The manner in which Portuguese names of different varieties of the mango are disfigured, almost beyond recognition, may be seen from the following quotation taken from a description of a 'Mango Show' held in Bombay which appeared in the Times of India, 14th May, 1928. "Mr. Bodke's silver medals were for Mankulas, Mushrad. Real Pyree. " 'Mankulas,' 'Mushrad,' and 'Pyree' are, no doubt, the Portuguese Mal-curada, Monseratte, and Peres.]

months are in use; outside Goa (in Kanara, Savantvadi, Malvan) and in other languages, English names of the months are adopted. Indian months are lunar and do not coincide with the European months. Some of the Malay names, like Julu, Mársu, testify very clearly to their Portuguese source; the origin of others is doubtful, as of Jun, October.

In Sinhalese, Mártu, Júni, Júli, are evidently from the Dutch, Maart, Junnij, Julij. The names of the other months may be either Dutch or English.

Agradecer (to thank). Mal. agradecer (Haex).—Tet., Gal. agradéci.

Água benta ('Holy water'). Konk. ág-bént; more commonly used is álmét.—Beng. ag-bent.—Mal. aguabenta (Haex). [In Konkani the form almént is also met with.]

In the Indo-Portuguese dialects água is contracted into águ or ag, and bento into bent. In álmét, l takes the place of g and m of b, with the absorption of the nasal following.

The Hindus call their sacred water by such names as tírt^h, gaṅgá, gaṅgodak. The Christians could have used the term pavitr udak, in the same way as in Teto they speak of bé saráni, 'water Nazarene or Christian, i.e., Holy.'

[Aguila, Aquila (the name of an aromatic wood, Aquilaria Agallocha, Roxb. or of Aloexylum Agallochum, grown in Cochin China and at one time highly prized in Europe). Anglo-Ind. eagle-wood.—Indo-Fr. bois d'aigle.¹

The etymon is the Malayal. agil, from Hindi agar, Sansk. aguru (lit. 'not weighty; light') or agaru, which gave gaháru or gáru in Malay. The Portuguese converted the Malayal. agil into águila which again some of the older writers corrupted into áquila, which in Anglo-Indian and Indo-Fr. was mis-translated respectively into eagle-wood and bois d'aigle. (See Hobson-Jobson, s. v. eagle-wood, and Gloss. Luso-Asiatico, s. v. águila, áquila, also Garcia da Orta, Coll. xxx)].

[“The fragrant wood call ‘aloes’ in Proverbs, VII, 17, etc., was the Aquillaria Agallocha, the Hebrew word for which ahalim or ahaloth, is evidently derived from the Tamil-Malayalám form of the word, agil, than from the Sanskrit agaru, though both are ultimately identical.” Caldwell, Comparative Grammar, p. 92 (1875), cit. in Glossario.]

āya,¹ | ‘Indian wet-nurse.’ See ama. |

Simonet finds a remarkable similarity between aia (Basque zaya) and the Arabic-Persian dāya, ‘midwife, a nurse.’ In the Indo-Portuguese of Goa daia is used in the sense of ‘a midwife’; the same also is the case in Teto.

The adoption of the word, aia, must be attributed to the fact that there was no corresponding term current, which was as simple as this.²

Ajoelhar (to kneel; the archaic form of the word is ageolhar). Mal. ingeolar (Haex), injiolar.

The etymon of ingiolar is evidently engeolhar, which, if it is not another archaic Portuguese form, must have been derived from em geolhos (‘on knees’) used, since the sixteenth century, in the bastard varieties of the Portuguese language

² Ayál in Tamil is a vernacular term; it means ‘mother, wet nurse, maternal grandmother.’

current in the East.¹ The modern Portuguese dialect of Malacca has injabel, injubel, 'on one's knees, to kneel'; that of Singapore: injilhá 'to kneel'; of Ceylon: injoelho, injivelho, injevejo, injivejo (adv.), 'on one's knees, having knelt'; that of Damaun: injoelh, 'on one's knees, having knelt'; of Bombay: injvelh, 'on one's knees' (pusá injevelh, 'to kneel'); of Macau: dizelo, from de joelhos, 'on one's knees.'²

Bengali has injuvel, enjíl, 'knee', used by the Christians. Enjil deon 'to kneel.'

Ajudante (assistant, adjutant). Konk. ājudánt (us. in a restricted sense).—Mal. aju-dán.

Ajudar (to assist, to help). Konk. ājudár-karuñk (especially in the sense of 'serving Mass'); vern. terms ādhár divuñk, hát divuñk.—Tet., Gal. aídúda.

² Cf. impé ('to be on one's leg'), impedo, impido ('being on one's leg') in the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon; impé, in that of Cochin; and empido, in that of Macau.

In Teto and Galoli there does not exist the sound j; on this account the Portuguese j is replaced by d; thus we have: kreda from Port. igreja ('church'), duiz from Port. juiz ('judge'), kaidú from caju (Anacardium occidentale).

Alar (to haul). L.-Hindust. ālā (us. only in the imperative form).

Alâmpada (a lamp in a church). Beng. ālamp (in use among the Christians). See lâmpada.

Alavanca (hand spike used as lever for moving heavy bodies). Konk. lavang; from this has arisen the expression lavangám pārayó ulauñk, which is figuratively equivalent to uttering high-sounding words, or undertaking a work beyond one's scope or powers.—Sinh. alavānguva.—Tam. alavāngu.—Mal. alabanka, albanka.—Gal. lavanka.³

In Konkani the term is only used of the big hand-spike;

for the smaller one the vernacular term pāray is used.

Albacora (a large sea-fish of the tunny genus). Anglo-Ind. albacore. See Hobson-Jobson.¹

[Yule is inclined to believe that the Port. word 'albecora', from its form, is almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy is unable to trace it in Arabic dictionaries. The O. E. D. derives it from Ar. al-bukr, 'a young camel, a heifer.' Gray in his edition of Pyrard (Hak. Soc.) thinks it is probably el-bakra, 'the cow-(fish)', according to the common practice of naming marine animals after those of the land. There are some also who derive it from the Port. alva ('white') and cor ('colour'), but the consensus of opinion is in favour of the O. E. D.'s view. The albecora is the Thynnus albacora, Lowe.]

The original of the Portuguese vocable is the Arabic al-qatrān; but Bengali received the word directly from the Portuguese and passed it on to Garo; this is clear, because languages more influenced by Arabic than Bengali have not got it, and also because the word retains the definite article (al) which words that are derived directly from the Arabic drop, as for example: jeb, from Arabic al-jeb ('pocket'). The Neo-Aryan terms are: dúdh ditali, dúdhkārīṇ, thānkārīṇ, dhātrī. These are little used, because mothers in the East, as a rule, nurse their own children.²

Amancebado (one who lives with a mistress). Tamil masuvádu. The Port. dialect of Ceylon has masabado.

The term must have been introduced as a euphemism, like alcoviteira in Malay.

into the East together with the plant.¹

["The Spaniards called it Pinas because of its resemblance to the pine-cone, but the Portuguese adapted to their own tongue its Brazilian name Nanas and called it Ananas, a word which in some form or other has accompanied the plant throughout the world... There are no names for it in any of the classical languages of Europe, Asia, Arabia or Egypt." Sir George Watt, The Commercial Products of India, s.v. Ananas sativa. The same writer in A Dictionary of the Economic Products of India (1889), Vol. I, p. 236, says: "It was introduced by the Portuguese into Bengal in 1594." He does not cite any authorities, however, for this date. From the Memoirs of the Emperor Jahangueir (trans. Major David Price, Calcutta, 1904, p. 22), it is evident that the pineapple was introduced much earlier into India. "I shall mention one (fruit) in particular, the ananauss (pine-apple), being among the most delicious of those reared in the island of the Frenqueis (Portuguese); of which fruit this same garden has been known in a season to have produced nearly one hundred thousand." The garden referred to is the Gûlaf-shann garden laid out by the Emperor Baber in Agra. For references to the pine-apple in Abul Fazl's Aini Akbari see Hobson-Jobson, s.v.]

The change of the first n in some of the Malasian languages must be attributed to dissimilation.

According to Männer, the Tulu name for the fruit is parengi-pela-káyi, which literally rendered gives 'Portuguese-fruit-jack.'

The word farangi or firingi is a Persian corruption of 'Frank' and is used to denote 'a European' in general, 'a Portuguese' in particular, and in a more restricted sense 'an Indo-Portuguese'; in Konkani, Sinhalese and Tamil, the word exclusively denotes a 'Portuguese'.¹ And as the

In the Dravidian languages the word is also used to mean a 'cannon or a piece of ordnance.' Tam., Malayal. perangi; Tel., pirangi, phirangi, phiringi; Kan., Tul. pirangi, phirangi. In Kambojan parēang means 'a European' and parēang-sēs from Port. francês, 'a Frenchman.' In Persian, Firangistan is the name for Europe.

are borne in processions.' (Cândido de Figueiredo). Portuguese lexicographers either do not give the etymology of the word or, some of the more modern ones when they do give it, say that it comes from andar ('to walk'), or from andas [subst., 'a litter,' a portable vehicle much like the Indian 'dandy']; there are others, like João de Sousa, who derive it from the Persian andol or andul, or, rather, handul, and describe it as 'portable vehicle used in India' (Bluteau).

Bluteau gives under separate heads, without pointing out the etymology, both the Indian and the Portuguese meanings of the word. He says: "Andor among us is a contrivance with four arms, etc." Solano with much reason combines both the meanings: "It is a species of portable vehicle (andas) on which men are borne or the images of the gods in Asia, or the image of Christ, or the saints among the Catholics, in their processions."

Fifteenth century writers, like the author of the Roteiro

da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, Duarte Barbosa, Castanheda, João de Barros,¹ Gaspar Correia, Damião de Góes, regard the term as new and foreign, and explain it by referring it to the Portuguese andas.²

Andor occurs as a foreign word in an Arabic book of the eleventh century (Kitāb 'Ajāib-al-Hind), from the French translation of which Yule quotes in Hobson-Jobson: "Le même m'a conté qu'à Serandib (Ceylon), les rois et ceux qui se portent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans les handoul

1 "Receiving the message of the Camorij, Vasco da Gama landed with a dozen followers and was received by a noble person whom they call Catual who was accompanied by two hundred men on foot, besides others for transporting him on their shoulders in an andor: because, in all that land of Malabar, they do not employ draught animals. One of the andores was also offered to Vasco da Gama for him to travel in." João de Barros, Dec I, iv, 8.

2 Cristóvão Vieira (1534) employs the word andor without explaining it; many others who lived in the Orient likewise do not explain it. "The lesser mandarins who are unable to use an andor have a horse." Letters from Portuguese Captives in Canton, ed. Donald Ferguson, p. 79.

(handūl) qui est semblable à une litière, soutenue sur les épaules de quelques piétons.” [“The same person has told me that in Ceylon, the kings and those who go about in the manner of kings are carried in handouls, which resemble a litter, borne upon the shoulders of some carriers.”]

Shakespear derives the Hindust. handolá, not from Arabic or Persian, but from the Sansk. hindola,¹ “a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock; a swing or ornamented litter in which are borne the images of Krishna during the Swinging-Festival.”

From this it can be concluded that andor went to Portugal from India where it was used in a restricted sense.² See palanquim.

Thus Yule says that the Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Isays from the frequency of this apostrophe ('I—say') in their mouths. To this Crooke adds: "The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne." From a quotation furnished by Crooke it appears that about 1863 Indian Sepoys in China were invariably called 'Achas' because Acha or good was the constantly recurring answer of a Sepoy when spoken to.]

The etymon is the Arabic raṭl or riṭl, which, in its turn, is supposed to be derived from the Greek litra. See Hobson-Jobson. It appears that the word, in some of the languages at least, has proceeded directly from the Portuguese. The corresponding vernacular term is ser.¹

Arrear (naut., to ease off a rope, to lower). L.—Hindust. ariyá.—Tul. áriya.—Mal. aria. It is generally used as an imperative. In L.—Hindust. ariya-kurná is ‘to lower’.²

The question of the place of origin and of the etymology of ata and anona, names often used promiscuously and, there-

¹ In Marathi and Gujarati Sitá-phal, 'Sita's fruit,' in Sindhi Sita-phalu, in Kanarese Site-phala. In Tamil simply sittá; also aninuna, perhaps for anona. In Hindustani it is called sharífa, [and in Pers. sharífah and kāj.]

"There is to be found likewise another tree in the land with the name of ateira ('the custard-apple tree'), the fruit of which is similar to the small pine; it contains a white kernel which is very savoury and sufficiently hot (quente)."
Fr. Clemente da Resurreição in Agricultor indiano, of B. F. da Costa, Vol. II, p. 337. ['Hot' is evidently used of the custard-apple in the same way in which Garcia da Orta often speaks of plants and drugs as being hot and dry, cold and moist. Even at the present day in India, there is a general belief that some fruits and vegetables are 'hot' and others 'cold.' Sir George Birdwood's explanation is that in practice 'hot' or 'cold' drugs are those which either promote or repress aphrodisia. (See Garcia da Orta, Simples and Drugs of India, ed. Markham, Introduction, p. xv.)] fore leading to confusion, is a very intricate one; these names are used quite spontaneously in various parts of India, as is also the case with caju and goiaba (q.v.).

Among the sculptures of Bharhut, among the engravings at Muttra, and among the mural paintings at Ajanta, there is a fruit represented which is very like the custard-apple, but of an uncommon bigness. General Cunningham identifies it with the Anona squamosa, and traces its Indian name át or átá to the Sansk. ātrapya, and maintains that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit into India were merely bringing coals to Newcastle.

[To this Watt (A Dict. of the Econ. Prod. of India, Vol. II, p. 260) says that the representations referred to by General Cunningham might be associated with a large number of plants; they may prove to be conventional representations of the jack-fruit tree or some other allied plant: they are not unlike the flower-heads of the sacred kadamba or Anthocephalus. He also remarks that the Bengali names nona and ata are so much opposed to the custard-apple tree being indigenous to India as are the names Rámphal and Sitáphal in favour of that idea. He maintains that people of India have adopted pre-existing names for introduced plants, and that there is no evidence to shew that this is not the case with the vernacular names given to the custard-apple.]

But Max Müller doubts the existence of such a word as ātrapya in real Sanskrit; Yule and Burnell suggest that Sanskrit names have been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Relying on the authority of the Dutch botanist Rheede¹ and of a Manilla vocabulary, these writers presume that the ata and its name came to India from Mexico by way of the Philippines, whilst the anona and its name came to India from Hispaniola by way of the Cape of Good

Hope. See Hobson-Jobson, s.v. custard-apple.

It is, however, necessary to note that if the Anona squamosa entered by way of the Philippines, it did not carry with it its name of ata, because the Malayan languages do not give it that name, but call it nona, and it may well be that ate or atte of the Manilla vocabulary is of modern introduction. The plant is also a native of Brasil, where it is likewise called ata or ateira.

Atalaia (a watch-tower; also a boat used for patrolling). Sinh. aṭṭālaya.¹

The doubling of the consonants is very common in Sinhalese, as also in Malayalam and in Tamil; but the cerebralisation of tt, as in this case, is uncommon.

[The Portuguese dictionaries give 'watch-tower' as the meaning of atalaya. According to Dozy (Glossaire etc.), it is the Ar. at-talāyi plural of at-tali'a, originally meaning 'watchmen or sentinels'. He makes no mention of its being used to denote a boat, a meaning which the word has in the old Portuguese writers on India, who frequently employ the term to describe a boat used for patrolling and watching the coast, and sometimes also of a boat equipped for fighting. Dalgado (Glossario) says it is not easy to make out whether the Portuguese carried to India the term which they had received from the Arabs, or adopted it from some of the Indian languages. From the way in which it is employed by the old Portuguese writers, he is inclined to take the latter view. But he does not know of any vessel in India with a similar name and object unless it be aṭālī, from the Sansk. aṭṭāla or aṭṭālī (kā), which means 'the top-storey of a house, tower or observation-post,' and is current in Gujarati, Marathi and Hindustani. It is but natural that a patrol-boat should have an elevated place from which to carry on observations.]

S before e and i becomes palatalized in Konkani and Marathi. In Malayalam v takes the place of b. Cf. bateria.

There is another word with the very same meaning—bāsan: in Konk., Mar., Guj., Hindi, Hindust., Or., Beng., Ass., Punj., Sinh., Mal. (bājan), Sund. (bājan, vājan), Jav. (vājan), Anglo-Ind. "There is a species of rice called pulot, which when boiled only in bafo ('in steam'), sticks to the hands and is so moist that it looks as though it had been cooked in butter." Garcia da Orta, Col. lviii [ed. Markham, p. 460.]

The etymology of the Portuguese word is uncertain. In Spanish vaho corresponds to bafo. "F. Diez believes that it may be an onomatopoeic word, but since its plausible etymon has not yet been discovered, and although imitative words are as a rule suspect, when they are not mere interjections, we shall, in the absence of a better derivation, accept provisionally the opinion of the unsurpassed founder of Romanic philology." Gonçalves Viana, Apostilas aos Dicionários Portugueses.

Molesworth derives the Marathi word from the Sansk. bāṣpa or vāṣpa, 'tear, vapour.' Shakespear does the same with regard to the Hindustani term. It seems that in the Portuguese word we have a case of parallelism, as in chapa ('stamp or mark'), tanque ('tank'), varanda ('verandah').¹

Bailadeira (dancing-girl). Indo-Fr., Anglo-Ind. bayadère. In English the compounds

'dancing-girl' or 'nautch-girl' are more in use. See Gonçalves Viana, Palestras Filológicas.¹ [Tavernier uses the form baladine, which Crooke says is from the Port. bailadeira. See Travels in India (ed. Ball, Ox. Univ. Press), Vol. I, p. 71.]

Bailar (to dance). Mal. bála—Sund. bálá, a dance. Main bálá, to dance.

At times the final r of Portuguese verbs is dropped. Cf. emprestar, tomar. In the Asio-Port. dialects also, there is the form bala.

Baioneta (bayonet). Konk. bāynêṭ.—Sinh. bayinêṭṭiya, bayinêṭṭuva.—Tet., Gal. baionêta.—? Mal. gaganet.

Gonçalves Viana declines to accept that the Malay word is Portuguese in origin.

Baixa (decrease, fall). Konk. báyṣ.—Tet. baiṣa.

?Baixel (in the sense of 'an Arab barge'). Konk. bagló.—Mar., Guj. baglá, bagalá.—Tel. bagalé. Bagalé-báyi, 'mouth of the bagale,' a glutton. —Anglo-Ind. buggalow.—Ar. baqalá.

Yule and Burnell think it very probable that the term was in use in India before the arrival there of the Portuguese, and had been carried thither by the Arabs.

There is another variant probable or possible of the Portuguese word, but designating another kind of vessel: Konk. bazró.—Mar., Beng. bajrá.—Hindust. bajrá, bujrá.—Anglo-Ind. budgerow.

[Yule says: "In Correa (c. 1561) bajel or baxel occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeres (j and x being interchangeable in Sp. and Port. See Lendas, I, 2, pp. 592, 619, etc.)." But

Dalgado is of the opinion that, if pajer is not a mere phonetic variant of paguel, 'a cargo boat formerly used in Southern India,' then it may have come from bajrá, used in Marathi, Bengali and Hindustani, to designate another kind of sea-vessel; and this term would be pronounced pajara or pachara in the Dravidian country. See Glossario, s. v. paguel.]

Balão (in the sense of 'a species of rowing vessel'). Sinh. balama.—Malayal. balam.—Anglo-Ind. balam, baloon, balloon.¹—|Mal. báloq |.

The primary word is the Guj. baliyan; balyāmv in Mar.-Konkani. Bengali has baulia.

¹ "With five lancharas (q. v.) and a dozen balões he came looking for me." Fernão Pinto, ch. xv.

"He gave orders to enter the creeks which surround the city even by means of balões, which are small vessels." João de Barros, Dec. II, ix, 3.

"D. Estevão de Gama sent Simão Sodré with eight balões (which are a species of light vessels)." Id. Dec. IV, ix, 12.

"Dom Estevão sent Pero Barriga and Jorge d'Alvarenga, in balões, to go along the river to see what they could find there." Gaspar Correia, III, p. 627.

[In his Glossario Luso-As., the author expresses his doubts regarding the Gujarati origin which he had ascribed to the word in the present work. The word under various forms is found in several languages all over India. Marathi has balyāmv, Gujarati, baliyan, Bengali, baulia (used chiefly in Chatigão), Malay, balang, the meaning of which does not square with that of balão. He thinks it very probable that the birth-place of the Portuguese balão was Malabar and that its original is the Tamil-Malayalam vallam, "a canoe hollowed out from the trunk of a tree" (Percival); and this is the primary meaning of the word. It is not unlikely that the Malays received the word, like other names of boats such as parau and kapal, from the people of Southern India, before the arrival of the Portuguese. Fryer uses the English variant of the word, viz., 'balloon,' in the sense of a 'Barge of State'. See East India and Persia (Hak. Soc.), I, p. 182. It is evidently in this very meaning that the word is used in

Siam for the O.E.D. describes it as "a Siamese state-barge, upwards of a hundred feet long, and richly decorated".]

Balchão ('a species of caviare'). Konk. balchāmv.—Beng., Tam. balcham.—Anglo-Ind. balachong, blachong.

From the Malay balāchán, it was introduced by the Portuguese, and employed in the Portuguese dialects of Asia¹.

Balde (a bucket). Konk., Mar., Guj. bāldi.—Beng., Hindust., L.-Hindust. bāldi, bālti.—Sinh. bāldiya, bāliya.—Tam. bāldi.—Tel. baldī, bāldī.—Tul. bāldi.—Anglo-Ind. balty.—Gar. balti, baltin.—Mal., Tet., Gal. bāldi.

The etymology of balde is not clear. The Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, derives it from Low Latin batellus, and Cândido de Figueiredo associates it, in a doubtful manner, with baldo ('unprovided, peniless'). Gaspar Correia regards the word as new and assigns to it an Indian origin.

¹ "Besides this the bilimbins (q. v.) are useful in the preparation of appetising balchão." B. F. da Costa, Agricultor Indiano, II, p. 216.

" All this our men will see for themselves in the port of Cananor, in which there are very large vessels, which the Captains will send their men to see, so that they might give an account of everything they had seen when they go to Portugal; on these ships there are no pumps, only some pails made of thick cow's hide, tanned in such a way, that they last long, and with these they bale the water out by hand; these pails they call baldes (I, p. 123).

" Luis de Mello de Mendoça set out with his companions to help at the baldes, with which they began to bale out the water " (1546). Diogo de Couto, Dec. VI., iii, 3.

Indian dictionary-writers give the Portuguese word as the original: " Balty, s. H. bālti, ' a bucket ', is the Portuguese balde ". Hobson-Jobson.

Bambu (bot., Bambusa vulgaris; bamboo). Anglo-Ind. bamboo, [bambou].—Indo-Fr. bambou.¹

The origin of the word is very obscure. Marsden mentions it as a pure Malay word; but the common name for it is buluh. Crawford considers it to be a term that belongs to the west coast of Sumatra. Wilson regards it as coming from the Kanarese, and Reeve mentions it as such; but the usual terms are biduru (Tulu beduru) and gala. It appears to me that the most probable source of the word is the Marathi bāmbú (the same in Gujarati), which is the generic and common name of the plant.

The form mambu, which occurs in the Portuguese chroniclers, might have been really in use then in the Konkani, as the authors of Hobson-Jobson suppose, and the present day Konkani term mán ('bamboo') would then represent the contraction of the word; or it might be due to dissimilation in the mouth of the Portuguese.¹ Inversely, Bombaim is due to the assimilation of Mombaim, a form employed by Barbosa, Botelho, Garcia: the vernacular name is Mumbai, a corruption of Mumbadevi, 'the Goddess Mumba'. See Gerson da Cunha, The Origin of Bombay.

[The earlier Portuguese writers of the sixteenth century speak of the bamboo by the generic name of 'cana' or 'cana de India. Barbosa (1516) refers to "some canas in India which are as thick as a man's leg". Cit. in Glossario.']

Banana (the fruit of Musa Sapientum, L., plantain). Anglo-Ind. banana (l. us.)—Indo-Fr. banane, bananier.¹

The Portuguese called the bananas, by analogy, 'the figs of India', and as figos they are known over the whole range of Asio-Portuguese dialects, which also employ figueira, 'the banana-tree', and figueiral, 'a plantation of the banana-tree,' and in Goa also bananeira ('the banana-tree'). Tomé Lopes, who sailed for India in 1502, compares bananas with figs: "A species of figos long and big like small cucumbers, which is one of the most savoury fruits that can be had in the world".² Cf. the German Paradiesfeige.³

It is not known for certain when and by whom the word 'banana' was introduced into India, which, according to Garcia da Orta, came from Guinea. "They also have figs in Guinea, where they call them bananas."¹ It appears that the term made its entry

(through the Portuguese ?) in the seventeenth century as being more appropriate, or, rather, to mark the difference between the fruit of the Musa paradisiaca and of the Musa sapientum, now reduced to only one species.¹

Anglo-India employs generally the term 'plantain', which is a corruption of the Spanish plantano, another name for the 'banana.' See goiaba.

[Mocquet, Voyages (ed. 1645), calls 'bananas' figues de platane. Watt (The Commercial Products of India) says: "The name 'banana' is very seldom used by the English in India, though it is universal in the fruit-shops of England. In India all kinds are indiscriminately called plantains." Yule quotes Robertson Smith, the great Arabic scholar, who points out that the coincidence of the name 'banana' with the Ar. banān, 'fingers or toes', and banāna, 'a single finger or toe', can scarcely be accidental. The fruit grew in Palestine before the Crusades; and, though it is known in literature as mauz, it would not follow from this that it was not somewhere popularly known as 'fingers'. He thinks it possible that the Arabs, through whom probably the fruit found its way to W. Africa, may have transmitted a name like this. To this Dalgado says that it is hardly credible that the word should have crossed over from Arabia to West Africa without leaving any trace of itself in the languages of the East Coast. immediate source of the Port. word), which itself comes from the Sansk. vaṇij, ‘a trader’, and vaṇij-jana, ‘a tradesman’. Yule thinks that it is probable that the Portuguese found the word already in use by the Arab traders. Among the humours of philology might be mentioned P. F. Vincenzo Maria’s (1672) explanation that the Portuguese called the Hindu traders of Gujarat Bagnani, “because of the frequency and superstition with which they washed themselves throughout the day”. Bagnáre in Italian means ‘to bathe’. The early European travellers applied the term to the followers of the Hindu religion generally. The old Portuguese writers, with the exception of da Orta, say that “all the baneanes follow the doctrine of Pythagoras”, whereas the truth is that Pythagoras drew a large part of his doctrine from India. There is a third sense in which the term is or was used in Calcutta, viz., of an Indian broker who is generally attached to European business houses in India.

One compound in which,

'banyan' figures is the 'Banyan-tree' (Ficus Indica), called in Hindi bar, and in Guj. vaḍ. "The Franks call it the tree of the Banians, because, in places where there are any of these trees, the idolaters sit under them and cook there. They reverence them specially, and generally build their pagodas either under or close to one of the great trees." (Tavernier, Travels in India, Ox. Univ. Press, Vol. II, p. 155.) Another more modern compound is "banian-hospital", which is the equivalent for what is commonly known as pinjra-pole, derived, according to Crooke, from pinjra, a cage, and pola, the sacred bull released in the name of Śiva.

Bata (an extra allowance made to soldiers or public officers). Anglo-Ind. batta, ration, foodstuffs; allowance, gratuity.

The word is Indian, and the corresponding Portuguese term employed by the old Portuguese writers is mantimento ('subsistence money' or 'allowance').¹ Simão Botelho says

"All those who served in Malacca, whether by sea or land, were to be paid six months' salary in advance, and also were to receive monthly two

(p. 237): "And for two farazes ('porters') two pardaus each per month, and four tangas for bata." The editor of Botelho's Tombo do Estado da India, Rodrigo Felner, remarks that bata appears to stand for bate, i.e., 'paddy', or 'rice in the husk'. But there is no error in the text; because bate is itself a corruption of bata, (a), Marathi-Konkani bhát Kanarese bhatta.¹ But the author does not use the word in this sense, but in that of 'ration', as is seen from the text and the item that follows: "And for the chief gunner, thirty eight thousand nine hundred and twenty reis per year, inclusive of mantimento." In this case, bata is the same as the Hindust. bhata, bhatta, or bhātá; Mar. bhatta bhātá, or bhātém; Konk. bhātém.

Reeve says that bhatta is a Kanarese corruption of a Sansk. word, which cannot be other than bhakta, 'food' in general, and 'cooked rice' in particular, which is the principal diet of the Indian people.¹ In this last acceptation bhát (masc.) is current in Hindustani and Marathi; but in Konkani it is less used than śit; in Sinhalese bhakta, batta, and bat.

With the lapse of time bhát (neut.) came to be the prevailing name in Marathi and Konkani of 'rice in the husk' and of the 'rice-plant' itself, supplanting other terms like sál, dhán; it then passed into Kanarese and was found side by side with the vernacular něllu.²

Naturally, bhát in its two-fold meaning, of 'cooked rice' and 'rice in the husk', did not take long to designate, first, 'ration of cooked rice', then, 'uncooked rice' or 'money to buy the allowance of uncooked rice', and finally, 'food-stuffs, allowances, gratuities'. And to denote these

[From a citation made by Dalgado in his Glossario (Appendix) from P. E. Pieris, The Kingdom of Jafanapatam, p. 4., it is perfectly clear that Simão Botelho, in the aforesaid work, used bata in the sense of 'allowance', and not in that of 'paddy'. "The Canarese sailors were allowed batta at five fanams a month and the mocadaens double that amount."]

Batão ('difference in exchange' or 'agio'). Anglo-Ind. batta.

The original word is the Hindust. baṭṭāu (baṭṭā, bāṭṭā), whence Mar. vaṭāv, Konk., vāṭāv.¹

It is not probable that the Indian words owe their origin to the English 'potato', because, besides appearing without the initial syllable pa, they are to be found in the language-field which was more influenced by the Portuguese; the Konk. baṭāṭin is, undoubtedly, derived directly from the Port. batatinha (diminutive). With regard to the cerebral tt, cf. atalaia, abóbora, sorte.¹

The sweet potato (Convolvulus batatas), native of America, was introduced into India by the Portuguese, together with its name in the place of origin, which some of the languages preserved, whilst others replaced it with vernacular ones. Subsequently, the English imported the ordinary potato (Solanum tuberosum), and this as Yule and Burnell observe robbed the former of its name. The Portuguese in India must have distinguished the one kind from the other by the names batata doce ('sweet potato'), and batata de Surrate ('Surat potato') or Ingleza ('English potato'); and the vernacular languages must have restricted the use of the name batata to one species or the other.

"There is another which produces tubers similar to the small English potatoes." (In Agricultor Indiano, of B. F. da Costa, II, p. 339.) In the island of St. Nicholas, Cape Verde, they also speak of batata inglesa. (See Jour. Geo. Soc. Lisb., 3rd. ser., p. 354.) In the Island of Madeira, the sweet potato is called batata, and the other kind semilha. Spanish uses batata of the sweet-potato, and the kitchen variety it calls patata.

Bate ('rice in the husk'; also 'growing rice'). Anglo-Ind. battee or batty; formerly used in the south of India, now supplanted by paddy.

The source-word is the Marathi-Konkani bhát. See bata.¹

The Anglo-Indian paddy is from the Malay pádi, Jav. pári, which Crawford identifies with bate and seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But Yule and Burnell think "this is impossible, for the word pārī, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese".

[The derivation of batega is open to doubt says Dalgado (Glossario, s. v.). Old Portuguese writers sometimes explain the word when they use it, a proof that it was not much in vogue. The Ar. bāṭya is generally given as its original, but Dozy says that the insertion of g is singular the Moors of the Iberic peninsula, "because it is not at all probable that before that time Persia had commercial relations with the Far East". But the Arabs and the Indians had such relations, and they must have been then employing the word. Dr. Schuchardt's conjecture is that the Malays received it from Southern India. for the same cause they call the smallest money Bazarucos, as if they would say market money.” Burnell, in a note, remarks that the origin of the name is obscure, but the statement in the text is certainly wrong. But Gray, in his Pyrard (Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 68), edited four years later, thinks that “basaruco” is perhaps connected with “bazâr”. Crooke is not quite exact in stating (Hobson-Jobson) that Burnell and Gray are of one view regarding the origin of this difficult word.]

[Leaes (the plural form of leal) were small copper coins struck at Goa under the orders of Afonso de Albuquerque. The name is the Port. leal (‘loyal’) and was given, according to Castanheda (Historia, III, ch. 4), owing to the love of loyalty of the Portuguese. The leaes are the same as the bazarucos which were current under the Mohammedan rule in Goa and on the Western coast. The subject of Portuguese coinage in India offers many difficulties. Even in 1554 António Nunes, who compiled a book on the coins and weights of India (Lyvro dos Pesos da Ymdia e asi Medidas e Moedas), says that monies exhibit such variations that it is impossible to write anything certain about them. To have an approximate idea of the coins mentioned either in the text or the citations, it will be useful to know that in the early sixteenth century, for purposes of account, a tanga branca, equivalent to 120 reis, was divided into 4 barganins, and each barganim into 24 leaes, and each pardao into 5 tangas. For barganim see Hobson-Jobson, s. v. bargany].

"There are other kinds of fabrics which are made near the suburbs of Masulipatan in the country of the King of Golconda, and these pieces are called Betilles." Tavernier, Voyages (1676), v, p. 201.

[Yule thinks that the Sp. or Port. beatilla or beatilha, 'a veil', is derived, according to Cobarruvias, from "certain beatas, who invented or used the like". Beata is a religieuse. Compare the modern English use of 'nun's veiling'. Crooke quotes from the *Madras Admin. Man. According to D. G. Dalgado (Classificação Botânica, p. 5), Garcia da Orta was the first European to describe correctly the origin of this incense. He distinguishes three varieties of it: amendoadado or that filled with sort of white almonds, which was considered very good; preto or black, which was less valuable; and the third, beijoim de boninas or 'flowery benzoin' (see note to citation below), which was worth ten times as much as the others. In the Lembranças das Cousas da India there appears, among the "prices fetched by goods in Diu and their actual cost, "a maund of biscuouto 7 fedeads." Maund and fedeads are Indian terms. And Castanheda says that Afonso de Albuquerque arranged with Meliquiaz (Malik Ayaz) in Diu "to have bizcoyto made there, so long as there was wheat," and that he left behind "for making the bizcoyto a new convert to Christianity called Andrade."¹

The Achinese have meskut, which must have come from English, because Langen says that the word is specially used of Huntley and Palmer's biscuits.

The Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, and also that of Cândido de Figueiredo derive boiã from bojo ('belly, swell, paunch'). Gonçalves Viana, relying on a passage of Diogo do Couto, cited by Morais,¹ regards the term as originally Asiatic, belonging either to Malay or some of the monosyllabic languages of Indo-China. Fernão Pinto employs the word without explaining it: "Satins, damasks, and three big-sized boyões containing musk" (Ch. 55). Whatever be the origin of the word, there can be no doubt that in India the term was introduced by the Portuguese.

Fr. João de Sousa derives it from the Ar. bainito, which appears to be the Portuguese adjective bonito ('delicious') used as a noun.

Bonzo ('a Buddhist priest in Japan or in China').—Anglo-Ind., Indo-Fr. bonze.¹

The word is of Japanese origin, bózu or bónzu, first mentioned by Jorge Álvares, and, a little after, by St. Francis Xavier in his letters. It appears that bónzu is traceable to the Sanskrit vandya, 'venerable', applied to the Buddhist clergy in Nepali, in the form bandhya, and in

? Bote (boat). Konk., Mar. bót.—Siam bote.—Mal. bot.

In Konkani, as in Marathi, ág-bót (lit. 'fire-vessel') signifies 'a steamship.' The cerebral t leads one to suspect that the original of the word is the English 'boat,' pronounced in the same way as the Port. bote. As Malay and Siamese have no cerebral t, it is also possible that bote and bot are derived from the same English source.

Bóto in Japanese has also the same origin, which is testified to by the expression boto-reisu = 'boat-race.'

? Botelha ('bottle'). Konk.

It is not quite clear whether the source-word is the Portuguese botelha or the English 'bottle,' though, it is true, in none of the languages mentioned above there appears the t cerebral, which corresponds to the English t. Matthes derives the Macassar word from botelha. Dutch has bottel, and African Arabic botelya and butelya.¹

Bāṭli, in Marathi and Gujarati, is evidently from English. Sindhi has buti. The Port. dialect of Macau has botle, and that of Ceylon, botle, botel, and bottal. In Kanarese, baṭṭalu signifies 'a cup, a small vessel,' and is regarded as a vernacular term by W. Reeve. The Persian butri is, without doubt, a corruption of 'bottle.'²

¹ The difficulty is to ascertain whether the word botelha was used in Portugal in the 16th and 17th centuries.

The reason why the Portuguese word was adopted is not known. Persian and Hindustani have surakh with the same meaning; I do not know whether it has any etymological relation with the Portuguese buraco. The Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, derives it from the Latin foraculum, and Cândido de Figueiredo from High German bora. Gonçalves Viana is of the opinion that the former suggestion is the more probable one and, in support of his view, refers to furaco met with in some of the Portuguese dialects.

[Gray in his notes to Pyrrard (Hak. Soc. It is not known by what way the term found its way into India. The first syllable of the Indian term for it (ka-) is identical with that of the Portuguese, and the second (-phi or -pi) with that of the English or Dutch (coffee, koffij). But Turkish also has kaphe. Hobson-Jobson gives no citation from any early Portuguese writer on this point. The use of coffee had already been introduced into Arabia in the fifteenth century.

['The history of the introduction of coffee into India is very obscure. Most writers agree that it was brought to Mysore some two centuries ago by a Muhammadan pilgrim named Baba Budan, who, on his return from Mecca, brought seven seeds with him. This tradition is so universally believed in, by the inhabitants of the greater part of South India, that there seems every chance of its being founded on fact.

.....In Ceylon it is believed coffee was introduced by the Arabs prior to the Portuguese invasion of that island." Watt, The Commercial Products of India, p. 367.]

But in 1782 Fr. Clemente da Ressurreição, in his Treatise on the Agriculture (of Goa),¹ says: "There is another plant which could yield a safe and growing income to the owner of a plantation (provided its cultivation was increased), and it is the café (the coffee plant) because of the high esteem and relish in which it is held among the European and Muslim peoples. From its berry is prepared a very exquisite beverage, stimulating, promoting digestion, and nutritive, though it is attended with evil effects to the nerves if taken in excess; these injurious effects are mitigated by mixing milk with it, as is done in Europe and all over Turkey."

The term is derived generally from the Arabic qahua, which originally meant 'wine' and which was afterwards employed to denote the 'infusion of coffee.' Bunn, in Arabic, is the name given to the plant and the berry. Both these terms have been adopted by some of the Indian languages.

It is, nevertheless, not unlikely that the real origin of the word is to be found in the geographical name Kaffa, in Abyssinia, which is the primitive habitat of the plant.

[Sir George Watt (The Commercial Products of India), however, says: "The names given to the plant, its fruits..

....are mostly derived from either of two words: "kah-wah," an Arabic term that originally denoted "wine," and "bun," the Abyssinian name for the coffee plant or its beans. From these we have cahua, kawa, chaube, kapi, cáve, kava, café, coffee, and caféier; also boun, bun, ban,

ben, bunu, buncha. The earliest Arabic writers, however, used the Abyssinian name by itself or in combination: thus Avicenna (11th century) calls it buncho, and Rhases bunco. It was by them viewed as a medicinal plant and one very possibly that came from Abyssinia, so that the appearance of the Arabic name kah-wah may with safety be accepted as marking the progress into the final development as a beverage.']

In Konkani, khāpurđo (a diminutive form) is 'a little negro'; khāparlēm (neut.), 'a negress,' and, khāparpaṇ, 'coarseness, barbarousness.' In Indo-Portuguese cafrona means 'a negress'.

The word is derived from the Arabic kāfir, 'infidel, unbeliever.' In some of the languages this sense is retained.¹ With regard to the kh aspirate in Konkani, cf. camisa, cruz.

Cairel (narrow gold lace). Malayal. karal.

Cairo (the fibre of the coconut husk). Anglo-Ind. coir.—Indo-Fr. caire.

[Yule seems to be of the opinion that the Anglo-Indian form coir was introduced by the English in the 18th century. Crooke refers to the O.E.D. which gives 'coire' in 1697; 'coir' in 1779. 'Coir' was less likely to have been used by the Portuguese because

The evolution of a new form cadju in Anglo-Indian vocabulary is evidenced by the following passage taken from The Times of India, June 23, 1928: "The story of a leper living among the beasts of the jungle and subsisting entirely on fruit is being used to support the claim that the Cadju fruit (Anacardium Occidentale) is a cure for the disease."]

The suffix -s in Malay and in Teto and Galoli are due to the Portuguese plural form, cajus, as in meias ('socks'), uvas ('grapes'), tiras ('strips of cloth'), apas ('rice-cakes').

From this he concludes that the interval between the publication of the Colloquies (1563) and Acosta's Tractado de las Drogas y Medicinas de las Indias Orientales (1578) marks the period when the tree must have been introduced into India from America.]

The Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, derives the Portuguese word from the Italian calafattare. Fr. João de Sousa and Devic refer it to Arabic. Dozy and Jal have doubts about this derivation and prefer that from the Latin calefacere. Yule and Burnell favour the Arabic origin, but admit that the word in the Indian languages owes its origin to Portuguese.

The original is the Ar qal'aī, which has been adopted by the Indian languages, and which probably is related to the Malay kālang, the name for tin, and which, according to Yule, may have been the true origin of the word before us. Some Arab geographers derive the word from a place called Qalah or Qaleh, which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, which even to-day is famous for its tin-mines. nor from the Dutch kous, 'sock'. It makes its appearance already in the first quarter of the seventeenth century. "Caous (pronounced kaus), sock; caous sa-paris, a pair of socks" (Haex). Swettenham and Favre attribute it to an Arabic origin; but in Arabic there is no such word. Rigg says that in Sundanese kaus signifies, at the present day, 'sock' and admits it is from Dutch. The same is the opinion of Hardeland in respect of Dayak, and of Matthes with reference to the Macassar kāusu and Bugui kāusu & koso. Langen doubtfully gives 'kaus' as corresponding to the Achinese kaus. It is quite possible that kaus is the abbreviation of kāsut, from calçado, 'shoes', which in Macassar loses the t, or it may subsequently have felt the influence of Dutch.

safe, because there are other words the Portuguese origin of which is unquestioned which have a consonantal ending, that is, after losing the vowel termination of the parent word, as for example: karpus from Port. carapuça ('a kind of cap protecting one from cold'), martil from martelo ('a hammer'), gargalet from gorgoleta ('water-jug'), bulin from bolina ('bow-line'), prum from prumo ('a plummet').

In respect of kamer and musik, it may be said that the especial reason for the elimination of their last syllable is the necessity of getting rid of words accented on the ante-penultimate syllable, in view of the fact that the Malayo-Polynesian languages have no proparoxytones. If it can be established that mármarm ('marble') is derived from the Port. mármore, then we have another instance in proof of our view. Perhaps, almári or lamári from the Port. armario ('cupboard'), obey the same law.¹

St. Jerome is the first European writer to mention camisia in The Epistle to Fabiola.² Cândido de Figueiredo derives the Port. vocable from "Low Latin camisia, the origin of which is uncertain". Fr. João de Sousa assigns to it an Arabic origin.¹ [Skeat derives camisa from Celt and says that the Arabic qamis is from Latin. The O.E.D. is of the view that the Ar. qamis, 'a tunic', is from the Lat. camisia of St. Jerome.]

The initial q of Hindi and Hindustani and, perhaps, the kh of Marathi and Gujarati, indicate the direct source or influence to be Arabic. The initial k becomes sometimes

Some philologists regard kamong as a vernacular term of the Malayan languages, and not of Portuguese origin. Yule puts up a strong case in favour of the Malay kamong being the original of the Anglo-Indian 'compound', but he admits the possibility of the Malay word itself being "originally a corruption of the Port. campo, taking the meaning first of camp, and thence of an enclosed area." See Hobson-Jobson, s.v. campoo and compound.

[Crooke, in Hobson-Jobson s.v. campo, refers to White-way's note that both Castanheda (Bk. VI, ch. ci, p. 217) and Barros (see below) speak of a ward of Malacca as Campu China, which de Eredia (1613) calls Campon China, and he thinks this last name may supply a link between Campoo and Kampung.]

The origin of the Japanese term is doubtful; perhaps it is from the English 'candle', notwithstanding the difference in meaning. Gonçalves Viana believes that it is from the Spanish candela, 'a candle'.

It is very true what Yule and Burnell observe that it is most difficult to draw intelligible distinction between the various kinds of cotton fabrics which under a variety of names were formerly exported to Europe. Befetas is the same as the Anglo-Ind. baftas, a kind of calico made especially at Brouch (see Hobson-Jobson, s.v. bafta); for beyrames see under beatilha. Sabagagis is mentioned as one of the text-

? Canga (an ox-yoke). Mal., Jav., kang, bridle—[Anglo-Ind., cangue.]—Pid.—Engl. cango, “a species of chair or litter suspended from a pole and carried by two men”. Leland.

Swettenham regards kang as a vernacular Javanese term, and not without reason, because of the difference in meaning between it and the Portuguese word and, secondly, because the Javanese word has no vowel ending, which normally words in Malay borrowed from the Portuguese retain. See câmara.

Leland says that cango is a Japanese word; but the dictionaries which I have consulted do not give it the meaning which he says it has. These are the meanings which they give: “Chinese words; attending to the sick; safe custody;

iles produced at Cambay; Dalgado (Glossario) says he cannot trace its etymology with any sense of certainty. It is no doubt the Ar. sab’ (‘seven’) and gaz (‘a yard’), i.e., cloth sold seven yards to the rupee.]

rigorous imprisonment.” Hepburn.

Leland and Yule notice another vocable with the same meaning, viz., cangue, which Joaquim Crespo describes in Cousas da China as follows:

“The canga is a weighty square board, 80 centimetres wide and 5 thick, having a hole in the centre wherein the neck of the delinquent is held fast and locked.”

There is, according to Yule, a genuine Chinese word noted in a dictionary of the eleventh century under the form kang-giai (in modern Mandarin speech hyang-hiai). From kang-giai is derived the Canton form k’ang-ka, ‘to wear the canga’, and probably the Anamite gang.¹ He thinks it probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms and associated it with their own canga, ‘an ox-yoke’, or ‘porter’s yoke for carrying burdens’. But Gonçalves Viana says that the Portuguese word canga implied “either from analogy of the form or its use the board which is used in China for punishment." But there is no evidence that, in these meanings, canga was at that time in use in Portugal, nor has its origin, up to now, been investigated; the presumption is that it comes from con(ju)gar ('to join or unite').

Fernão Pinto calls the Chinese 'canga', collar ('a collar'). "Ordered us to be put into a narrow prison with fetters on our feet, manacles on our hands and collares on our necks." But Cardim in his Batalhas da Companhia de Jesus (1650) employs the term in its Chinese acceptation: "André was arrested for being a Christian and taken to the prison where they put round his neck a canga, which, as I have already said, is made of two thick pieces of wood in the shape of a ladder, and weighted more or less according to the crime of the offender."

[Crooke notes that the O.E.D., on the authority of Professor Legge, rejects Yule's view (see above) and maintains that 'cangue' is from the Portuguese canga, 'a yoke'.

Professor Giles is also entirely of the opinion that the word is from Portuguese and not from any Chinese term. As against all this, Dalgado, in his Gonçalves Viana e a Lexicologia Portuguesa published four years after the present work, inclines to the view that canga, in the acceptation of 'a wooden board worn round neck by Chinese criminals', is not from the Portuguese canga, 'a yoke for oxen', but has its origin in an Annamite word. His reason for this view are: (1) The earliest Portuguese chroniclers of India speak of this 'pillory of wood' as colar, and tabua ('board'). One of them who describes very minutely 'this instrument of torture' calls it by the Chinese name kiahao; none use the term canga. (2) the earliest reference to canga, in the Chinese acceptation, is in Cardim's Batalhas (see above), but before him, in 1635, António Bocarro refers to ganga in the same sense. "With his hands tied, they placed him in a boat and, accompanied by a bell, they took him with some speed along the whole fleet, and finally threw him into a sort of cage with a ganga round his neck" (in Pegu). Dalgado, therefore, is of the view that the source word of canga is not the Portuguese canga but the An-namite gang, which afterwards, following the laws of attraction, became transformed into canga. Cardim's reference to canga is also in connection with An-name. The Chinese name for this portable pillory is kiä. See Yule, Cathay, I, p. 179.]

In Sanskrit and the modern Prakrits kānjī stands for 'water in which rice has been boiled and allowed to become acid', such as is used for starching by Indian washermen.² Yule says that the English received the term from the Portuguese; perhaps he says this because of the identity of meaning of the two words, though congee is nearer the Indian word.

"Their white clothes are washed with water in which rice has been boiled, and thereby they become well starched." Gaspar Correia, p. 357.

[I cannot trace the reference for this statement of the author. In Hobson-Jobson, Yule connects the Anglo-Ind. 'conjee' with the Tamil kañji, 'boilings'. It is true that in Sanskrit and the modern Prakrits, as has been said above, kāñji signifies the usual starch of Indian washermen; but in Tamil kañji has both meanings: 'rice gruel', and 'starch', whereas in Malayalam the word is used only in the former sense, the latter being conveyed by the compound kañjippaśa = starch from 'congee'. From this it might be inferred that the Portuguese word was derived from Malayalam. See Dalgado, Glossario, and Contribuições.]

Malayalam has chartta, a writing, document; chārttuka, to execute a deed; chārttu-paṭi, a catalogue; chārttu-muṛi, a deed in writing.

Wilson, in his Glossary, thinks it probable that the word is of Portuguese origin. In which case, the change of the c, in the first syllable, to ch is to be expected.

"It is probable that it is one of these two words whose transformation gave rise to the Malay, Javanese, and Sundanese kartas or kertas, 'paper'. Although Arabic has the word kratas—otherwise qartas—(from the Greek chartés), kartas is not of Arabic origin, because in the Dutch Indies it is precisely the European and the Chinese paper that is called kartas." Heyligers. Michell also attributes a Portuguese origin to the Siamese word.

Notwithstanding these views, the Portuguese origin appears very improbable, especially, because of the divergence in the meaning of the word in Portuguese and the Eastern languages.

There is no evidence to show that the word carta had ever been employed in Portuguese to mean 'paper'. Cartaz was employed in India in the sense of 'a passport' or 'sailing-licence'; and in this meaning, it appears to be of Arabic origin. [The Ar. qirtās, 'paper, document.'] "Sailors from Coulão would send to Cochym for the certificate which they call cartaz." Gaspar Correia (I, p. 298). Many Portuguese verbs are employed in Konkani as neuter substantives, as for instance: pintár from Port. pintar, 'to paint', is used in Konk. to mean 'a painting'; razár and kum-sár, from Port. rezar, 'to pray' and confessar, 'to confess', are respectively used in Konk. in the sense of 'prayer' and 'confession'.¹

¹ As an exception to the rule I have hitherto followed, I am registering here the Portuguese word casar, though it has been adopted only by Konkani. I am doing this because of the various derivatives from the word which are in use in that language. There are various terms for marriage among the Hindus; lagṇ, varád, vārdik, hātí, vavar, viváha.

Casta (caste). Konk. kást; vern. terms zát, varṇ.—Anglo-Ind., Indo-Fr. caste.—Mal. kásta.

In the Konkani of Goa the terms kastist, 'one who is keenly alive to caste distinctions,' and kāstíjm, 'a strong caste sentiment', are met with. Both these terms are borrowed directly from the Portuguese spoken in Goa which has the forms castista, castismo.

Yule says that Duarte Barbosa (1516) does not apply the word casta to the divisions that obtain in Hindu society, but he calls these divisions so many leis de gentios, i.e., 'laws' of the heathen. But this view is disproved by the following passage (p. 334): "There are, besides the divisions mentioned above, eleven others composed of the lower classes . . . which prevent one casta from mixing with another casta ¹." [Ed. Longworth Dames, Vol. II, p. 59.]

Gonçalves Viana regards the Portuguese origin of these words as certain. Dr. Heyligers is of the opinion that they are derived from Sanskrit. In fact, kastūri, in Sanskrit, means 'musk', and kastūri-mṛga, 'a civet cat'. And in this sense these terms are employed as vernacular all over India. In Goa, however, castor, even at the present day, is the name for the 'black silk top-hat'.

Catana (a large broadsword). Tet., Gal. katāna.—*Jap. katana.

Wenceslau Morais (Day-Nippon) gives catana as a Portuguese word, introduced among the Japanese. Cândido de Figueiredo is undecided as to whether it is derived from Japanese or Italian. Bluteau, Morais, and Dr. Adolfo Coelho regard it as of Japanese origin, and Gonçalves Viana (Apostilas) says that this view is unquestionable.¹

In the Portuguese of Goa, catana is employed in the same meaning as the Konkani koytō, 'a large kitchen knife, or a wood-cutter's knife'.

3 [As one entered the corridor (of the palace), he saw a catre hanging from two silver chains.... Chronica de Bisnaga (1525), p. 120.]

The etymon of catre is the Malayal. kattil, in the meaning of 'bed, sofa,' derived from the Sansk. khatvā, which gave khāt in Konkani and Marathi, and also the diminutive khātlēm, 'a cheap rough-hewn bed'. It is interesting to note that, just as the Malayal. vettila assumed in Portuguese the forms bétele, bétel, betle, bétere, betre, so likewise kattil took the forms catele, cátel, catle, cátere, catre.

The Spanish Academy Dictionary mentions catre in the sense of 'a light bedstead intended for one person only', and derives it from cuatro, 'four', with reference to its four legs. But the mere mention of such a word in the Spanish dictionary is no proof that it is a genuine Spanish word, for coco, manga, palanquim, bazar are also to be met with in Spanish dictionaries, and these are unmistakably Indian words which had been taken over to the Iberic Peninsula by the Portuguese and were adopted not only by Spanish but also by other European languages.

Yule very properly remarks: "Cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have Hindi khāt and khaṭwā. . . .; in the south, Tam. and Malayal. kaṭṭil, a form adopted by the Portuguese."

The form catre, to judge from the quotations in the Glossario, was used as early as 1525, and acquired great currency in Portuguese. Besides the meanings of 'bedstead' and 'folding bed' noticed above, the word has been used in various other senses. In Port. India it is even at the present day used of a sort of hammock-litter or a palanquin. In the early Portuguese days it meant a throne, especially of the Malabar kings. For citations to support these acceptations see Glossario. Prof. S. H. Hodivala (Notes on Hobson-Jobson, Indian Antiquary, Vol. LVIII, 1929) quotes from Alberūnī's India (c. 1030) showing that katt was used in the sense of 'throne'. He also gives a fourteenth century quotation in which khaṭ is used of a 'bedstead'.

Cot was first used by Sir T. Herbert in his Travels (1634), according to the O.E.D., and this, as well as the fact that the form catre would more easily than the Hindi khāt give 'cot', inclines us to the view that the Anglo-Indian word is the same as the Port. catre.]

The origin of the word is uncertain. Yule says that he has not been able to trace the name to any Indian source. Burton, who is cited by Yule, derives it from the Arabic katīreh, 'a small craft'. Fr. João de Santo António Moura derives it from the Persian are the different names by which a cargo vessel was known on the southern coast of India. Dalgado, in his Glossario, says that Malayalam dictionaries do not mention any word corresponding to it, and that it is not unlikely that it was already in use in the Malabar Coast at the time when the Portuguese arrived there in the form pugala, equivalent to the Marathi baqālā, which represents the Ar baqālā, and is the name commonly given on the Western Coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. kātūr, 'a small ship armed in time of war'. But it is not certain whether such terms exist in Arabic and Persian. It appears to me that the true origin of the word must be the Malayal. kattiri or the Neo-Aryan kātar, from the Sanskrit kartari, 'a scissors'; literally 'a cutter', from the verb kṛt, 'to cut'. The craft whose distinguishing feature was its narrow shape, especially at the prow, which enabled it to cut through the water with ease, a fact noticed by the Portuguese chroniclers, might well earn the denomination kātar. This term is employed in various metaphorical senses: for instance, in Konkani, kātar is used to denote 'a cross piece of timber to hold fast larger beams, a pyramidal structure, an obelisk'. The word was current in Malabar and in the Konkan when the Portuguese arrived there; and if to-day it is not in use, it is because similar craft do not exist.

[The O.E.D. regards 'cutter' as an English word from 'to cut'; though this view does not agree with the author's which would have 'cutter' indebted to the Port. catur, yet by analogy it helps to lend strength to the derivation proposed above for catur, namely, from a Sansk. word implying 'to cut'.]

Cavala (Caranx caballus; a species of horse-mackerel). Anglo-Ind. cavally (us. in Ceylon).

Gaspar Correia says (I, p. 71): "There was (in Calicut) a lot of fish like sardines, which they called cavalinhas." The Portuguese called it by this name, not the people of Malabar, even as in Indo-Portuguese this fish is called cavala, because it resembles so much the small mackerel¹.

Batt., Sund., Jav., Mad., Bal., Day. kápal, a large ship; (in Batta there is an additional form hopal). Kápal-ápi (lit. 'fire horse'), a steamer. Cf. Mar., Konk. ág-bót.—Mac. káppalā.—Bug. kaválu, a horse (vern. terms titingang, anharang); káppalā, a ship.

Yule and Burnell, following Marsden, say that the Malay word kápal was imported from Tam. kappal, 'a ship,' which is undoubtedly a vernacular term, for in the Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama there appears capell as the equivalent of the Port. naoo ('ship'). Haex mentions the word in the same identical form and with the same meaning (cappal, 'a ship'), but not as of Portuguese origin, and distinguishes it from capalla, 'head', which is from Sanskrit.

If the source of the word is really Portuguese, it is a matter for wonder that a foreign word should be employed in a sense so far-fetched, without being used in its proper meaning or one having any relation to it. But Dr. Heyligers bears witness to the fact that only in High Javanese "the true meaning has been retained by the side" of the other. It is, however, possible, and very probable, that the word which means 'a big ship' has come to signify metaphorically in a poetical language, like High Javanese, a 'high horse', and not vice versa. W. W. Hunter mentions kapal as the vernacular name for the horse in Krama (High Javanese), and gives járan as its equivalent in Ngoho or Low Javanese¹. Bugui makes a distinction between kaválu and kappala.

Again, there is no satisfactory explanation as to why the Malays adopted the Portuguese cavalo when they had their own word kúda. The adoption of kovelú or torvélu, from Port. coelho, 'rabbit', in Malay and Javanese, and of koélhu, in Teto and Galoli, must be attributed to the fact that the animal was unknown among those people, owing to which there was no vernacular term for it. In the same way there is no especial name for the rabbit in India and it is,

Chahādán, chahādāni (Mar.), chādāni (Guj.), chādán (Hindust.), a tea-pot.

The Chinese ideograph which stands for the tea plant answers to two phonetic forms: chhá in the 'Mandarin dialect', and té in the dialect of Fuh-Kien. The first was adopted by Japan and by Indo-China, by Portugal, Greece, and Russia; and the second, by the other European nations, as also by the Malayo-Polynesian group of languages, and four Indian languages: Sinhalese and Telugu, Tamil, and Malayalam. The last two have also the other form.

It is not known for certain whether tea was known in India before the Portuguese arrival there, nor to what extent the propagation of the word is to be attributed to Portuguese influence, nor by what route the other form found its way to the Coromandel coast and made its entry into Ceylon. In the old Portuguese chronicles there are not many references either to tea or coffee. The first mention of it, according to Gonçalves Viana (Apostilas), is made by Frei Gaspar da Cruz in his Tratado da China (1569): "Whatsoever person or persones come to any mans house of qualitee, hee hath a custome to offer him in a fine basket one Porcelane...with a kinde of drinke which they call cha, which is somewhat bitter, red, and medicinall, which they are wont to make with a certayne concoction of herbes." [See Da Cruz in Purchas, III, 180.] And João Lucena (1600) says: "The Japanese attach a value to the most trifling and ridiculous things, as are the stuffs used in preparing a decoction from the herb which is called cha." Bk. VII, ch. 4.

Mandelslo, quoted in Hobson-Jobson, says in 1638: "In our ordinary meetings (at Surat) which we had every day, we did not take anything but Thé (tea), the use of which was very common all over India." But this ought to be understood in connection with the Europeans, their descendants, and some indigenous Christians; for, even to-day, the strictly orthodox Hindus abstain from tea, and Mussulmans prefer coffee.¹

John Crawford alleges that the word tea in its various European forms came from the Malay Te. If it did not find its way into India through the same channel, which is little likely, Sinhalese must have received it from the Dutch thee, and Tamil and Telugu from the French thé. And, in this case, it is very likely that the other Indian languages received their various forms directly or indirect-

¹ "They hold in great esteem this herb which is called Thé, which comes from China and Japan, and that from the later country is the better of the two..At Goa, Batavia, and in all the Factories of the Indies, there is scarcely a European who does not take tea thrice or four times a day, and they are careful to save the leaf in order to turn it into a salad for the evening, with some oil, vinager and sugar" (1676). ly from the Portuguese chá. It is noteworthy that Persian and Arabic have this same form, and it is not known when it was introduced into either of them.

[The O.E.D. says that the Portuguese brought (into Europe) the form cha (which is Cantonese as well as Mandarin) from Macao. The form te (thé) was brought into Europe by the Dutch, probably from the Malay at Bantam (if not from Formosa, where the Fuhkien or Amoy form was used). The original English pronunciation (tē), sometimes indicated by spelling tāy, is found in rhymes down to 1762, but the current (tē) is found already in the 17th century as can be seen from rhymes and the spelling tee. It also cites Meyer, Konversations-Lexikon, to show that the first mention of tea in Europe is due to the Portuguese in 1559 (under the name cha). It was first known in Europe about 1650-1655 and, according to Watt (The Commercial Products of India, p. 212), the first mention of tea-drinking in India is made by Mandelslo in the passage cited above.]

But cambolim is only the Port. form of the Konkani kamblém (pl. kamblīm), from the Sansk. kambala, appearing in the Indian vernaculars in slightly varying forms; it is the name of a coarse woollen cloth and has no affiliation with cameline.]

As regards its etymology, chapa is one of the most intricate vocables in this book. Is it Portuguese or Indian in origin? Or, rather, are the two words etymologically distinct? Has one of them influenced the other in some of the meanings?

Yule and Burnell allege that "it has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin".

Gonçalves Viana in his Vocabulário Malaio remarks that "the Portuguese vocable has been explained by the Germanic root klap, and also by plak, equally Germanic.. It appears to me admissible that this word came from India." But in his Apostilas

he maintains that "the most probable source of the word is the Germanic klap or plak; and he adds that "in the special sense of order, permission, ordinance, prescript" it is an Asiatic word and must be the Hindustani c'āp, 'stamp, seal'.¹

Castanheda (1552) also regards the term as Asiatic, and explains its meaning: "He ordered that nobody should be allowed to enter the Island nor depart from it unless he carried his chapa, as was the practice before. And this chapa was, as it were, a seal except that it was open from one side to the other, and used red ochre for making the official impression."² And Bluteau traces the relationship between the Portuguese chapado and the Indian chapa: “Homem chapado is a man who is armed in the chapa of his virtue or his honest toil, etc. The expression is borrowed metaphorically from the chapas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraved.”

Beames, Thomson, Fallon, and many other writers on Indian languages have no doubt at all that chapa is a pure Hindi term.

In the Tombo do Estado da India there is “a draft of the contract which the Governor Nuno da Cunha entered into with Nizamafé Zaman with respect to Cambay in the year 1537”. In this are met with not only the substantive form chapa, but also the verb chapar and its participle chapado, all of them employed in their genuine Indian meaning: “Soon after in my presence he (Nizamafé Zaman) signed and swore on his koran (moçafo) to keep and to maintain and to fulfil this agreement in its entirety.... and he sealed it (chapou) with his seal (chapa)...” “And inasmuch as the coins were stamped (chapada) with the coining die (sicca), i.e., struck with their mark...” Diogo do Couto likewise says: “He [D. Manoel de Lima] granted to him [a servant] a firman inscribed in big and beautiful letters and chapado (sealed) with the chapa (seal) of his coat of arms. Dec. VI, vii, 7.¹

It is worthy of note that in India the term chapa is met with only in the modern languages, with the exception, as far as I know, of Tamil and of Sinhalese, wherein it is not to be found. Chāpa in Sanskrit is the name of a bow. The introduction of the press has given the word new meanings and a greater denotation. Yule and Burnell are opposed to the view that chap, which is used in the Far East, is derived from the Chinese, and they maintain that it was carried there from India.

¹ Gaspar Correia, referring to Pedro de Covilhã, says: “Displaying a brass chapa (‘plate’) on which were engraved letters forming the name of His Majesty D. João and of Preste, in Chaldaic.” Bk. III, p. 29.

As regards the sematology of the word, the principal difference lies in the fact that in India we do not find chapa used in the sense of a 'metal-plate' (without inscription or engraving), for which there are special terms, like pāṭī, tagaḍ or lagad, patrēm. Likewise it is not used in the sense of 'a plain or flat piece of land'.

But there is one very notable coincidence, assuming there has been no transmission. Molesworth mentions chhápo, "a play among children", as a term used in the Marathi spoken in the Konkan; and Cândido de Figueiredo gives, among other meanings of chapa, that of "a kind of game among children". The Port. dictionary, Contemporaneo, explains, as also does Bluteau, the nature of the game of chapa, which consists in tossing up a coin and asking whether it is to be heads or tails, or cross or pile.¹

¹ I have not been able to discover what is the nature of this children's game, which is said to be played in the Konkan.

It appears to me that chāmp or cháp (with the ch mute), in the sense of 'a trigger of a gun' which is met with in several Indian languages, is derived from a different primary word, chāmpnā in Hindustani, chāpnēm in Marathi, 'to press, to compress'. In Konkani the word for trigger is kām̃v.

To conclude, it is almost certain that chapa was not transmitted from Portugal to India. The argument which carries most weight is that chháp or chhapá is "a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectarial marks (lotus, trident, etc.) which they delineate on their bodies" (Thompson, cit. in Hobson-Jobson); such a term could not be a foreign one, imported in modern times. The origin of the Portuguese word being itself enshrouded in uncertainty, it is not unlikely that it is Indian in origin, seeing that there is no evidence of its having been employed before the Portuguese conquests in the East. It is to be noted, however, that Duarte Barbosa (1516) employs chapeado in the sense in which it was used in Europe. "In front rides the Preste Joam in another wagon chapeado (plated) with gold, very richly attired. . . ." P. 215. [Ed. Longworth Dames, Vol. I, 41.]

Molesworth says: "Chepem n. R. (Rájápur) W. (Wari) (chepnem). A low, flattish hat or cap. Used esp. of the military hat or cap of the Sepoys and their officers." Chepném, from which the author wrongly derives the word, signifies 'to flatten, to compress'.

The primary source of this word, which has been adopted in so many Indian and Malayo-Polynesian languages, is the Tamil churuttu, 'roll, twist, cheroot; to wrap or roll round' (Percival). "It is, therefore, evident," says Gonçalves Viana with much reason, "that from India, and not from Portugal, this term was passed on to Malay, as it was to English, and from this latter to Portuguese".²

This fact is interesting, because the words for 'tea' and every thing associated with its service were borrowed by the Portuguese either from China or Malaya: chávena ('tea-cup') from Mal. chávan which is itself the Chin. tch'a-van; pires ('saucer') from the Mal. pirim, pl. pirins; bule ('tea-pot') from the Mal. búli. Bluteau, Morais, Vieyra, João de Deus, and Dr. Adolfo Coelho say simply: "V. tamancos (wooden-shoes)". It appears to me that the word is of Dravidian origin carried by the Portuguese to Goa and Malacca. It is in use in the Portuguese spoken in India. Gabriel Rebelo says: "Some bring (in the Moluccas) wooden chiripos".¹

But Crooke points out that Col. Jarrett in his translation of the Āin-i-Akbarī disputes the derivation of Sangtarah from Cintra, and is followed by Beveridge who is inclined to think that Santra is the Indian hill name of the fruit, of which Sangtarah is a corruption, and refers to a village at the foot of the Bhutan Hills called Santrabārī, because it had orange groves. Again, Watt (The Comm. Products of India, s.v. *C. footed animals... The Hindus regard the cobra as sacred, and keep some in their temples.... An author in Rome, once happening to refer to the cobra de capello, heard a Portuguese who had returned from India describe it, and the Portuguese not being able to give another word for capello, the author was much puzzled as to whether it stood for 'hair' or 'hat', because the Italian capello denotes both these. As a result of this he had a cobra represented in one of his Latin books with more hair on its body than a bear, though there is not a trace of a hair on it, and with a hat on its head, with its tassels spread out. We laughed a great deal at the sight of this picture." Not less provocative of good humour is the derivation or mistranslation of the name of this snake cited by Crooke from Christopher Fryke (1700): "Another sort, which is called Chapel snakes, because they keep in Chapels or Churches, and sometimes in Houses." This description is obviously influenced by stories of the cobra being kept in temples, and also in private houses in India.]

Cobra manilla (the venomous snake Bungarus caeruleus or Daboia Russellii). Tel. manila-páyu (páyu is 'snake'). —Anglo-Ind. cobra manilla or minelle (us. in South India). [In Ceylon called polonga.]

The source-word is the Marathi-Konkani manêr, from the Sansk. manî, 'a jewel'. The Telugu term appears to be an importation.¹

[Molesworth in addition to maner also mentions the form manyâr. The snake perhaps takes this name from the common belief of the people that it 'wears a precious jewel in its head'. A citation from

Lockyer (An Account of the Trade in India, etc., London, 1711, p. 276) in Hobson-Jobson provides one more popular explanation of the name:

“The Cobra Manilla has its name from a way of Expression common among the Nears on the Malabar Coast, who speaking of a quick motion.. say, in a Phrase peculiar to themselves, Before they can pull a Manilla from their Hands. A Person bit with this Snake, dies immediately; or before one can take a Manilla off. A Manilla is a solid piece of Gold, of two or three ounces Weight, worn in a Ring round the Wrist.” See manilla.]

Coche (a coach). Konk. kôch, palanquin.—? Guj., Hindi., Beng. kôch, sofa—? Sindh. kôchu, sofa—? Sinh. kôssiya.

Probably, like the Hindust. kauch, the above are derived from the English ‘couch’. This appears plausible in view of the difference in meaning between the Portuguese word and those in the other languages mentioned above.

Côco (the tree and nut Cocos nucifera; coco-nut). Anglo-Ind. cocoa, cocoa-nut, [coker-nut].—Indo-Fr. coco, cocotier.²

[“The old Portuguese writers speak of the coco-nut palm by the generic name of palmeira and not as coqueiro (‘coco-nut tree’), which is a modern term, even now not much used in Port. India. Foreign writers, who preceded the Portuguese, called the fruit nux indica or nace d’—

“Nothing was found except cocos and jaggery.” Castanheda, I, ch. 25.

With regard to the origin of the word coco, see Conde de Ficalho’s ed. of Garcia da Orta, Col. xvi; Cândido Figueiredo, in the Instituto of Coimbra, Vol. XLVIII, p. 655, and Gonçalves Viana, Apostilas.

India, in imitation of the Arabs who called it jauz-al-Hindī. At the present time, the word coco is employed by all European languages.

With regard to the etymology of the word, a number of hypotheses have been suggested, not excepting that which assigns to it an Egyptian origin, kuku! But if we note what the old Portuguese writers, who are the most competent to speak on this matter, say, there can be no doubt about the origin of the word.

The author of the Roteiro (1498), referring to Mombasa, says: "The palms of this country bear a fruit as large as melons of which the kernel within is eaten and tastes like nutty galingale" (p. 28). And the same writer, when in India, says: "And the provisions consisted of coquos and four jars containing oakes of palm-sugar" (p. 94). It is, therefore, in Malabar that the companions of Vasco da Gama gave the name to the fruit, and certainly did not borrow it from the vernacular of the country which calls it teṅgu, nor from the modern Aryan languages which call it nārel or nāral, Sansk. narikela, Pers. nargīl. That they did not learn this name in the locality, but transferred it by way of analogy from one object to another, as they did in the case of figo and pera (q.v.), we know from Barros, da Orta, and others.

The source-word is, therefore, the Portuguese coco, which was formerly used, as it is even to-day in Castilian, in the sense of 'a bugbear, a grotesque face to frighten children with'. Bluteau gives a derivation which is the very reverse of this, but it indicates the meaning which coco had in Portugal: "Coco or Coca. We make use of these words to frighten children. because the inner shell of the Coco has on its outside surface three holes giving it the appearance of a skull." Dalgado, Glossario.

The passages from Barros and da Orta referred to in the above quotation are as follows: "Our people have given it the name of coco, a word applied by women to anything with which they try to frighten children; and this name has stuck, because nobody knew any other, though the proper name was, as the Malabars call it, tenga, or, as the Canarins call it, narle." Barros (1553), Dec. III, iii, 7.

"And we, the Portuguese, with reference to those three holes, gave it the name of coquo, for it has the appearance of the face of an ape or some other animal." Garcia da Orta, Col. LIII; ed. Markham, p. 139. But earlier Barbosa (1516), describing the coco-nut palm of Calcut, or rather of Malabar, says: "We call these fruits quoquos" (Lisb. Acad. ed.).

Linschoten (1596) says: "The Portingalls call this fruit (of the 'palme tree') Coquo, by reason of the three holes that are therein, like to a Munkie's head" (Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 43.). There is no doubt that herein the Dutchman is merely reproducing either da Orta (1563), or Acosta (Tractado de las Drogas y Medecinas de las Indias Orientales, 1578) who had borrowed largely from da Orta. But P. A. Tiele who edited the second volume of Linschoten for the Hak. Soc. in a note to coquo says that "the name 'coco' was first used by the Spaniards who found the tree in America". He gives no evidence for this statement which, after the thorough and convincing exposition of Dalgado, needs merely to be mentioned as one of the various suggestions that have been put forward to explain the name.

There is no unanimity of opinion with regard to the question as to what is the original home of the coco-nut palm. De Candolle ultimately inclined to the idea of an origin in the Indian Archipelago. Cook stoutly upholds an American origin. Wiesner (Die Rohst. des Pflanzenr., 1903, II, 419) quotes authority for a dual nationality (American and Asiatic). But the general trend seems to be in favour of an Asiatic origin. See Watt, The Commercial Products of India, s.v. Cocos nucifera.]

Hindu physician Susruta. Whitelaw Ainslie (*Mat. This would indicate that the disease was widespread in India and certainly known in the zone in which the Portuguese influence was most felt. Garcia da Orta speaks of it as collerica passio, and Couto as colera (see Hobson-Jobson); one might, therefore, have expected that the foreign name for this disease would have found an entry into more of the Indian languages, especially in view of the extensive practice then enjoyed by Portuguese physicians. But the curious fact is that, far from this being the case, the Portuguese themselves borrowed the Konk.—Marathi modsi, the name for cholera, corrupted it into mordexim (q.v.) and passed it on to the English and the French in the form mort-de-chien, which was the name by which cholera was known to Europeans up to the end of the eighteenth century. Da Orta says that morši was called hachaiza in Arabic. This Ar. name in the form haizah is still used in Hindustani to denote 'cholera'. Burnell (n. Linschoten, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 235) says that the first European to mention this frightful disease was Garcia da Orta in 1563, but it was known long before in India under the Sanskrit name visū-cikā, which does not however agree with the name given by Ainslie.]

Corja (a mercantile term for 'a score'). Konk. kórj. Malayal. kórja, kórchchu.—Tul. kórji.—Anglo-Ind. corge, coorge.—Indo-Fr. corge, courge.¹

It appears that the source-word is the Neo-Aryan koḍi. Wilson (A Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms) mentions the Telugu khorjam as the original, which Yule and Burnell presume to be a corruption of the trade word.

[Corja in Port. or corje in Anglo-Ind. is a very interesting word and its derivation is a source of considerable divergence of opinion. Dalgado, in his Glossario, modifies his views expressed herein and

A corja of cotonia (q v.) costs one hundred and forty 'tangas.' Lembranças das Cousas da Índia, p. 49.

"We speak of corja rubies, which is as much as to say they are sold in lots of twenty. Garcia da Orta, Col. xliv. [Markham renders this: "Such as we call score rubies because they are sold at twenty the vintem". There is an evident confusion between vinte ('twenty') and vintem ('a Portuguese coin worth about twenty reis.')]] suggests that the Malayalam kórchchu, which means 'a threaded string' (like a string of pearls) or 'a bundle of thread', derived from the verb kōrkk, 'to thread', is the original of the Port. word corja; for the ch of Malayal. is represented by j in Port. and vice versa. The Port. jagara is from chákkara, and jaca from the Malayal. chakka; conversely the Malayal. chenel is the Port. janela, and chudu the Port. jogo. He is of the opinion that the term acquired great vogue in India, owing to its being synonymous with the Aryan koḍi, in the sense of 'a score', because it was usual for a great number of commercial articles to be sold 'by the score'. H. H. Wilson gives the Telugu khorjam as the source-word, but Yule and Burnell presume this to be a corruption of the trade word. And in fact, Brown in his Telugu dictionary observes that korja or khorja is a commercial term. Konkani has korj (side by side with kóḍ), Tulu kōrji, and Malayal. kōrja, which is evidence that they owe their origin to the Port. form. The Neo-Aryan languages have koḍī, admitted also in Tamil, to designate the number twenty; it is very much in vogue among the people who reckon in kodis or 'scores'. But the difficulty is to show the process of phonetic evolution which could give corga from koḍī or korī, in view of the fact that the normal representation of this word, in Portuguese, would be cori or core as areca is from adeka. Longworth Dames who has taken special pains to collect expert opinions on the origin of this word comes to the conclusion that, if the Dravidian origin is admitted as possible, the Malayal. form suggested by Dalgado seems more probable than the Kanarese korji put forward by Crooke in Hobson-Jobson, especially, as trade words are most likely to have come into use on the Malabar coast. He notes that Dr. G. P. Badger (The Travels of Ludovico di Varthema, Hak. Soc.) says that koraja is in use in the same sense among the Arabs of the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, but he did not consider it of Arabic origin. It is no doubt purely Indian, and must have been introduced into the Red Sea and Persian Gulf by the Portuguese and by Indian traders. every day wear' (Morais). or an augmentative of cota, 'a vest of thick texture' (Segundo Cerco de Diu, from which Morais quotes). But it is also possible, if not probable, that the original word may be the Malay kútong, which is also used in the corrupt Portuguese dialect of Malacca, carried to India by the Portuguese together with the baju, another article of Malay dress, which is worn on the top of the kutong. This explanation would fit in better with the meanings of the Indian words, excepting that of 'dressing gown' in Konkani, which appears to agree with that of the augmentative cotão.

It is to be noted that kútong, in its turn, may be traced to the Persian khaftán, 'gown', since Fabre is of the opinion that báju has also its origin in the same language, although there is a difference in the meanings of the words: "bazu, the name of a garment used in bathing which is tied at the waist". There is another word in Persian, kattán or kuttán, which signifies 'a fabric made of linen'. According to Shakespeare, qaftán, in Turkish. is "a robe of honour".

With regard to baju, the word belongs to the Portuguese vocabulary. Cândido de Figueiredo mentions it as a term current in Miranda, and the Portuguese dictionary, Contemporaneo, says that "the women's jackets, used in the province of Minho, are called by that name".

João de Sousa derives baju from the Arabic badjú and defines it as "a certain species of gown which was largely used by women, and which some women, even now, use in our provinces where they give it this name"; he quotes in support Damião de Góis: "The King of Calicut was dressed in a white baju of silk and gold, and was seated on a *catel*¹ [a sort of bed in Malabar].” Morais, who attributes to the word the same origin, says that it is “a garment which covers the body; it has short sleeves and a skirt up to the knees: in Asia, both men and women wear it; in Brazil, only the women, and some of them there call it bajó”. Vieira mentions both forms bajó and bajú, and defines either as “an Asiatic garment in the form of a jacket”; in support he quotes Castanheda,¹ and observes that the term is “used in the popular songs of the Azores Islands”. Bluteau has baju as a “word from India”, and gives it the meaning of “a shirt covering half the body”.

The author of Chronica dos Reis de Bisnaga gives the form bajuris and says that “they are like shirts with a skirt”. The term is met with in the Port. dialect of Goa specially in connection with the phrase

pano-baju, which is used of a certain style of female dress, to distinguish it from the pano paló, a style which is purely indigenous.¹

Among the Indian languages Konkani alone recognises the word (bāzú), and employs it in the Malay acceptation. The Sinhalese women use the baju, but they call it bách-chiya.²

The Arabic and Persian dictionaries which I have consulted do not mention badju or bazu in the sense of ‘a gown’ or anything like it, nor could the Arabic scholars whose assistance I sought help me to clear the point. But H. N. Van der Tuuk is of the opinion that the Persian bājū, ‘arm’ (Sansk. bāhu), is the source of the word; that originally bājū was no other than “een kleeeding-stuk met armen, a gown with arms”, i.e., sleeves! Yule and Burnell hold it for certain that the source of the Anglo-Ind. bad-joe or bajoo, ‘the Malay jacket’, is the Mal. bājū; and the authors whom they cite appear to confirm their opinion.¹ The term is met with in the principal languages of the Indian Archipelago, as for instance, Javanese, Batak, Dayak, Macassar, Bugui. [Linschoten (Hak. Soc. Vol. I, p. 206), speaking of “the manner and costumes of Portingale and Mesticos women in India”, says, “within the house they goe bare headed with a wastcoate called Baju, that from their shoulders covereth their navels, and is so fine that you may see, al their body through it...” Burnell who edited this volume explains the word thus: Baju, i.e., Hind. bāzū, is “a kind of short shirt, reaching down to the hips, with very short (if any) sleeves; sometimes open at the upper part of the chest in front” (Qanoon-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. xv.)

² “They wear the bajú and a cloth which reaches right down to the soles of the feet, a style very staid and decorous.” João Ribeiro, Bk. I, ch. xvi.

Cotonia (a kind of piece-goods either of silk or mixed silk and cotton). Konk., Mar. kutní, striped cloth either of silk or cotton.—Anglo-Ind. cuttanee.¹

The original word is the Arabic qutnīa; but Yule and Burnell suggest doubtfully the Persian kuttán, ‘linen or cotton cloth’.

Cova (pit, hole, grave). Mal. koba (a term used in some game).—Mac. kova.

Côvado (a cubit or ell). Konk. kóbd.—Anglo-Ind. covid (obs).—Tet., Gal., kóvadu.

This term was at one time very much in use in trade circles in India. Tavernier (1676) refers to it frequently and regards it as a vernacular term. "Bojetas measure 21 cobits when they are unbleached, but when bleached they are only 20 cobits." (V. p. 200). [Ox. Univ. Press. ed. (1927), Vol. II, p. 6.]

[Tavernier gives further information of the 'cubit' in Bk. II, ch. xii: "The cobit is a measure for all goods which can be measured by the ell, of which there are different kinds, as we have different kinds of ells in Europe. It is divided into 24 tassots." Tassot ought to be tasū, which is properly the breadth of the second and third fingers. Bojeta, in the former quotation, is the Pers. bāfta (past part.), 'woven', and is the name of a very fine calico, made specially at Broach.]

Crasso (thick, gross). Mal., Sund., Jav. kras, keras (adj. and adv.), strong, vigorous; strongly, energetically. Haex and Swettenham also mention the form dras.

Dr. Heyligers admits the Portuguese origin; but it appears to me that his opinion is not well-founded. Crasso is a term used generally by the learned. See grosso.

?Cravado (stuck into, thrust into). Tam, Malayal. karuváḍu, salted fish.

The derivation, suggested by Gundert, is improbable because of the meaning of the word. Karavala is 'dried fish' in Sinhalese, and Percival says that the Tamil "karuvāṭṭuváli is the name of a bird whose tail is like that of a fish,—Corvus Baliassius".

Tam. karámbu, kirámbu; vern. terms lavangam, iluvangam.—Malayal. karámbu, karayábu, karappa.—Siam. kravhn, cardamom.

Gundert says that karappa comes from the Ar. qarfaḥ. But qarfaḥ signifies 'bark, cinnamon', and qaranful, mentioned by Belot as vernacular, is the name of the clove, which it is also in Persian, in addition to mēkkeh or mekkeh, 'a small nail'. Shakespear, in his Hindustani dictionary, derives qaranful or qaranphúl from the Greek karyóphyllon, which is literally equivalent to 'the leaf of the walnut-tree'. Garcia da Orta, in Colloquy xxv, says: "Your Greeks did not speak of this guriófilo" [ed. Markham, p. 213].

[The primary meaning of the Port. cravo, from Lat. clavus, is 'a nail'; this name was, evidently, given to this spice because of the clove's resemblance to a small nail. Cloves in the early days of the Portuguese connection with the East were more in demand than other spices, and, to use the phrase of Camoens, "clove-trees were bought with Portuguese blood". This is a way of saying that many Portuguese lost their lives in attempting to discover the islands in the Moluccas which grew clove-trees. Conde de Ficalho (Colloquies de Garcia da Orta, Vol. I, p. 368) thinks that the Gk. garyophyllon or, as da Orta writes it, gariofilo does not represent an original Greek word but the Hellenisation of some oriental name; he also believes that the Ar. qaranfal or karumpfel are likewise derived from the same oriental name. In the opinion of Dymock (Mat. Med.) all these names are derived from the Tam. kirámbu, and the Malay karámpu; because it was through the medium of these people that this spice penetrated into India, and afterwards came to be known to the Arabs and the Greeks.]

Curral (a cattle pen, a paddock). Anglo-Ind. corral (us. in Ceylon), 'an enclosure for the capture of wild elephants.'—? Kamb. crol; this may be a vern. term.

The word curral does not appear in the dictionaries of the Sinhalese or Tamil languages, nor is it in use at present, according to my information; nor do I know whether it is current in the Indo-Portuguese dialects in this sense. It must have become current in Ceylon during the sway of that island by the Dutch, who carried the word to Africa, in the form kral, 'a native village or settlement.' See Webster, s.v. kraal.

Conde de Ficalho (Colloquy xxi) says: "It appears that this method of hunting elephants was introduced or brought into general use in Ceylon by the Portuguese; the enclosure, which in India is called keddah, receives there the name of korahl or corral, which is evidently the Portuguese word curral." But the method was known and practised before the sixteenth century, according to the testimony of Tomé Lopes, who sailed for India in 1502: "Ceylon has a large number of wild elephants, very big ones, whom they domesticate by building a big enclosure with a strong palisade, and a drawbridge between two trees, inside which they place a female elephant already domesticated." Navegação ás Indias Orientaes, in the Coll. of Ramusio, trans. the house). Sinh. nónā, a lady, a European woman.—Mal. dónia, nona, nónya, nyonya, noña (= nonha), ñoña (= nhonha), a woman of European or Chinese descent, or a woman married to a European or Chinaman.—Ach. nona, the daughter of a European by a Chinese woman : a young lady. Ñoña, the wife of a European or a Chinaman ; a married woman.—Sund. nóna, a young lady ; núnya, a European or Chinese married woman.—Jav. ñoña.—Day. ñoña, a married woman, specially a European.—Mac., Bug. nóna, a young lady ; nhonha, a married woman.—Batav. ñoña or nyónya.—Tet., Gal. dona.

Favre distinguishes between nóna and nóna, in respect of orthography and etymology, and gives as the meaning of nóna, without making mention of its derivation, "an unmarried woman, a damsel, daughter of a person of quality," and indicates the Portuguese dona or the Spanish dueña as the probable original of nóna.

Dr. Heiligers likewise suggests dueña.

Dr. Fokker says: "With regard to the origin of the word ñña, which some pronounce nña (a woman married to a European or a Chinaman), etymologists are not in agreement. It is more probable that the word comes from Chinese rather than from the Portuguese senhora, with the elision of the first syllable, as in gareja from 'igreja.' "

Gonçalves Viana traces a connection between senhora and nyóra, nyónya, nónya and nóna, and indirectly conveys that there has been an evolutionary process involved; Dr. Schuchardt holds this origin as most certain and supports it with an intermediate form nhonha, used in Cape Verde.

But this does not appear to be so very certain. The word nóna, as an honorific praenomen and a title of reverence, is current in the Portuguese dialects of Ceylon, Cochin, Mahé, Bombay, Diu, Malacca and Singapore; and, in some of these, it has acquired the additional meaning of 'grandmother,' as nono, in the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon, exclusively means 'grandfather.' Now, in the Portuguese dialect of Malay and of the Cape Verde Islands, dono signifies 'grandfather' and dona 'grandmother,' and these are mentioned by Morais as archaic meanings of the word in Portuguese.¹

The transition from dona to nona is much easier and more natural (by means of regressive assimilation) than from senhora (sinhara, nhara, siara in Portuguese dialects), which would have to be subjected to an extensive process of the aphasis of a syllable, the assimilation of a liquid and nasal palatal, and of single and double depalatalization. And the word senhor did not go through this process in Malay when it was transformed into sínho and síyu. Besides this,

1 "Do you know the reason? It is because Dona is a term which in the Portuguese dialect of the place means 'the name of the house,' and is used of children. And it is by this name they are called till they reach majority or till death..... Now, if you wish to know what Dona means, I will tell you; it is equivalent in Portuguese to avó ('grandmother') and Dono to avó ('grandfather'). Creolo da ilha de Santo António, in Jour. Geo. Soc. Lieb., 2nd ser., p. 131.

the influence of another word having the same sound, nona = anona (q.v.), not only with respect to phonetics, but equally so with regard to the diminutive sense that the word has acquired, is not impossible.

It is pertinent to note that the Malay variants are not in fact successive but synchronous, with difference in meaning, and that dona was employed formerly to signify 'a lady, a woman of quality,' and was used by itself without being prefixed to a name.¹ In this sense, the word is still in vogue in East Africa, where it is used of ladies of Portuguese descent.²

"This Dona was as yet young in age, but a very gentle woman." Diogo do Couto, Dec. V. x. 7.

² "Dona. Title given in East Africa to women of mixed (Portuguese and Negro) origin." A. C. de Paiva

The palatalized forms nonha and nhonha do not necessarily imply their derivation from, or the influence of, senhora; they could have been the result of the evolution of nona, as can be seen in the Portuguese vizinha from Latin vicina, ponha from poniat, nenhum from nem hum, ninho from nidum, with the previous assimilation of d.

Cf. pipínhu (from pepino, a cucumber) in the Portuguese dialect of Malacca. Moreover, nonha (l. us.) in the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon, and nhonha in that of Macau have a diminutive meaning, and are probably diminutive forms.

On this account, I do not regard as improbable the derivation from dona and the contact of dona and senhora and their mutual influence; and what appears to me also possible is the influence of nona=anona ('bullock's heart') and of nina=menina ('a girl'), which in the Portuguese of Macau makes its diminutive nhinina, according to J. Elefante (elephant). Konk. elephánt, an unbleached or white cotton shirting.—[Anglo-Ind. elephanta.]—? Nic. li-janta.—? Malag. elijanta.

In the Portuguese of Goa elefante is also the name of a white shirting; the elephant 'chop' or mark on the piece appears to have given rise to the name; there are other kinds with the 'camel' and 'deer' marks, but not so largely in demand as the former.

[Others call it nhom.]

It is quite possible that the original of the Nicobarese word is, as Man suggests, the English 'elephant.'

[In Anglo-Indian speech and writings one meets with the term 'Elephanta' in connection with showers of rain: elephantas or elephanta showers. Elephanta is, according to Yule, a name given originally by the Portuguese to violent storms occurring at the termination, though some travellers describe them as at the setting-in, of the Monsoon.¹ Crooke is of the opinion that "the Portuguese took the name from the Hindi hattiyā, Sansk. hastā, the 13th lunar Asterism, connected with hastin, an elephant, and hence sometimes called 'the sign of the elephant.' " But the Sansk. hasta means 'a hand,' and this is the name of the Nakshatra because of its supposed resemblance to a hand. In Marathi, too, hasta means

'a hand,' and the plural form of the word, hastin, is used to signify "the thirteenth lunar asterism, designated by a hand" (Molesworth). The thirteenth asterism has nothing to do with an elephant; and yet in popular speech and proverbial sayings, whether in the Deccan or Gujarat, this asterism is associated with the elephant: Padel hathi tar padel bhinti (Mar.), lit. 'if the elephant falls, then walls will begin to tumble', which is a way of saying that, if the 'Elephant Nakshatra' should send rain, there will be heavy downpours and houses will collapse; Hāthiyā-nim sunḍh fari khari (Guj.), 'the trunk of the elephant has verily turned,' by which it is intended to convey that torrents of rain have descended from the constellation Hasta. Etymologically it is not possible to connect the Sansk. hasta, directly, with hāthiyō (Guj.) or hatti (Mar.). These two forms could have come from hastin, an animal that uses one of its limbs as a hand, i.e., the elephant. But the difficulty is to show how the 'Hand Nakshatra' came to be transformed in the popular imagination into the 'Elephant Nakshatra.' We deliberately say 'popular imagination,' for, among the learned, the term used is not hāthiyó or hatti but hasta. The only plausible explanation, to some extent borne out by the quotation below from Thevenot, that we can offer, is that when the Sun enters Hasta, just about the end of the Monsoon, perhaps, the banking of immense dark clouds in the north-east created in the popular mind the picture of a herd of elephants assembling together, and the deep rumbling sounds, which accompany the thunderstorms, became associated with the trumpeting and terror-inspiring rage of these mighty beasts.¹ The name of this Nakshatra in Western Astronomy is Corvus, 'the Raven,'

and this in itself is proof of how the imagination of different peoples can conjure up different pictures or forms from the same object.

Dr. S. K. Banerji, Metereologist, writing to The Times of India, 24th April, 1929, propounds, however, a novel theory with regard to the origin of the name 'elephantas.' This is what he says: "I do not propose to discuss the origin of the word 'elephantas,' as to whether the Portuguese got the word from the Nakshatra 'Hasti' (Elephant, one of the 27 Nakshatras in Hindi Astrology), but there appears to be no harm in calling these heat thunderstorms 'Elephantas,' for amongst the hills over which they are seen to develop from the Colaba observatory, the most well-known is the little island-hill 'Elephanta.'"

The observation that the thunderclouds form in the direction of the Elephanta Island is no new one,¹ but the attempt to explain the term 'elephanta' by connecting it with the Elephanta Island is new. *A Ilha do Elephante*¹ ('The Island of the Elephant'), and not 'Elephanta' (an Anglo-Indian transformation, feminine in form) was the name given by the Portuguese, in the early part of the sixteenth century, to the island which was then known, as it is even to this day, to its inhabitants and those of the surrounding country, as Ghārāpurī or, shortly, Purī. This name was given because of the life-size figure of an elephant, hewn from one single mass of trap-rock, which formerly stood in the south of the island, not far from the usual landing-place, and which, to save it from destruction, was removed in 1864-5 to the Victoria Gardens, Bombay, where it can still be seen. explanation appears to us untenable, first of all, because it is not to be presumed that the indigenous people, who to this day cling tenaciously to their own name for the island, viz., Ghārāpurī, and will not make use of the foreign name 'Elephanta,' could have introduced the latter term into their folklore and proverbial sayings. Again, the term 'elephanta' was used of the storms that were usual about the termination of the Monsoon in places far away from Bombay or the Island of Elephanta. Sir Thomas Roe when at the Moghul Emperor's Court at Ajmere experienced on the 20th August, 1616, "a storme of rayne called the Oliphant, vsuall at goeing out of the raynes" (The Embassy of Sir Thomas Roe, Hak. Soc. p. 247). And Fryer when sailing near Ceylon (1673) refers to these thunderstorms and definitely connects them with the 'Elephant Constellation'.¹

What has 'St. Francisco' to do with 'the Elephant,' and which of the different saints that go by this name in the Roman Catholic Calendar is the one referred to here? the term "St. Francisco," alluding, I suppose, to the Saint's Day, either of St. Francis of Assisi, the founder of the Franciscans, 4th October, or of St. Francis Borgia, the third General of the Jesuits, 10th October." I am inclined to think that the odds are in favour of 'St. Francisco' being the Assisian, rather than the Jesuit General, for the earliest religious to come out to India were the Franciscans who were spread all over the East; they were very influential, and their convent in Goa was described by Pyrard (Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 53) as "the handsomest and richest in the world," and they were indefatigable in promoting everywhere the cult of their great founder. They must have helped to create the general belief in the minds of the Portuguese and the Indian Christians that after the feast-day of St. Francis of Assisi there were no more 'elephantas' to be feared and the fair season might safely be assumed to have begun. Even up to the present day there survives an analogous belief in Goa. It is, that the sand-bar, which blocks the mouth of the harbour of Goa from the beginning of the rains, disappears on the feast-day of St. Lawrence, the 10th of August, from which date it becomes possible for vessels to enter the port. Compare with this the Hindu belief associated with the festival of the Nārelī Punimā, which takes place on the 15th day of Shravan, usually sometime early in August, viz., that after this date it is safe for ships and boats to put out to sea. This popular belief is connected with the appearance in the sky at this time of the star Agastya ('Canopus'), named after the great Rishi of this name, one of whose feats was to drink up the ocean because it had offended him. I feel perfectly convinced that the Christian legends associating St. Francis and St. Lawrence with certain weather conditions in Western India are instances of the way in which the Roman Catholic Church has in all ages been ever ready to accept habits, customs, dress, and legends of the people to whom she preached the new faith, so long as they did not appear to conflict with her principles of faith and morals, and very often to adopt them by giving them a Christian setting or background. In India, as far as the bulk of the people is concerned, not only are weather conditions governed by the movements of the stars and constellations, but practically most of the events in their lives, even such questions as the propriety of eating particular fruits or foods at certain seasons. For instance, in the Konkan, the popular belief is that it is not wholesome to eat ānvalās (Phyllanthus emblica), sugar-cane, or the fruit of the tamarind tree before the 12th day of the first half of Kārtika ('Pleiades'), on which day is commemorated the marriage of Krishna and the Tulsi plant; in Gujarat, the mango is believed to be unhealthy if eaten before Holi, i.e., the fifteenth day of Fālguna.

How keen the early administrators were on collecting and co-ordinating all kinds of information and traditions about weather conditions in India, no matter whether the reports were derived from friends or foes so long as they were trustworthy and they could help in rendering navigation safe, is also borne out by a reference given by Foster in his edition of Roe in connection with the quotation from him given above.¹

There can be no doubt, from all that has been said above, that Anglo-India owes the name 'elephanta' to the Portuguese, but it is very strange that there are hardly any references to this term among the Portuguese chroniclers. Dalgado, in his

Estado (state, condition). Konk. estád; vern. terms gal, bheś; ḍabāzó.—Mar. istád, household furniture.—? Tel. istuva, istuvu, property.—Tet. estádu, government.

Molesworth and Wilson derive istád from the Ar. isti'dād, 'capacity, aptitude'; but they do not explain why only Marathi should have adopted it.

? Estala (stable; stall). Sinh. stálaya, istálaya, istále.—Sund. istal.

Also in the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon, stella, stal. Probably from the Dutch stal.

Estante (book-case, a desk). Konk. estánt.—Beng. stānti.—Tam. stánte.

Esticar (to stretch, to extend). Sinh. istrikaya, istiri-kaya, stri-kaya (subst.), flat-iron for smoothing clothes. Istirikayen madinavā, to run the flat-iron.—Mal. istrika, flat-iron;

Tet., Gal. estrika, to smooth with a flat-iron, to starch.

The Portuguese dialect of Malacca has estika. See estirar.

Estingue (naut., brails). L.-Hindust. istingí. Istingí chāmpná, to furl the sails.

Estirar (to extend; to stretch out). Mar. istrí (subst.), a flat-iron for smoothing linen; the act of passing the iron over. Istrí karṇem, to run the iron on the clothes. —Guj. istrí, astrí, astarí (subst. and verb), flat-iron; to pass the iron over.—Hindi, Hindust., Or., Beng., Ass., Punj., Malayal., Khas. istrí, flat-iron. —Sindh. isitirí, flat-iron.—Tel. istiri, the act of passing the iron over.—Kan., Tul. istri, to pass the iron over.

Swettenham says that the Malay istrika comes from the Hindustani and signifies literally 'the woman's work'. But neither Hindustani has istrika nor does strika in Sanskrit mean 'woman's work'; but at the end of the compound possessive (bahuvirīhi) it means 'accompanied by a woman, he who has a wife, married.' Strikāryam is what stands for 'work, woman's work'; it cannot, therefore, be the source word of istrika, because it is very generic, and because the washing of linen as a profession is done in India, since the remotest times (and, perhaps in modern times, also that of ironing clothes), more by men than by women. The form in use in the Portuguese spoken in India, mainato, 'washerman' (q.v.), is indicative that washing was done more by men than by women.

Shakespear, in his Hindustani dictionary, distinguishes between istrí, istirí or strí, Sanskrit, 'woman, female,' and istrí, 'flat-iron,' which he says is from Hindi. But Molesworth connects the Marathi istrí with the Sanskrit strí, through the intervention of Hindustani, without assigning any reason. And Wilson derives the Hindustani istrí from the Sanskrit verb. str, 'to stretch out,' and mentions the compound stri-vālā, 'an ironing man, one who irons linen.'

It is very probable that the flat-iron (Konkani phér from Portuguese ferro, 'iron'), which has the same shape as the one used in Europe, and which is only employed by tailors and washermen, was not formerly known in India. I am of the opinion that the true originals of istrika and istri are the Portuguese words esticar and estirar, which would have been used in the sense of 'running or passing the iron over'.¹

[Whitworth very briefly describes Foras as the name of the tenure on which the lands reclaimed from the sea, or inter-insular channels about the island of Bombay, used to be held before the settlement made by Act No. VI of 1851. These lands were reclaimed chiefly by the erection of vellards (see valado), and being originally very salt, they were let out at very low rents to induce people to cultivate them. In process of time they improved and became valuable, and it was a question much discussed in 1844 whether the foras quit-rent could be raised or not. For the way this question was decided, see Hobson-Jobson. s. v. Foras-Lands.

That philology and the correct derivation of words are not without their influence on legislation is seen in the man-charge may not light on the Comp^a only, ... it seems reasonable that a Gen^l_π tax or assessment be enordered on the respective Inhabitants over and above the present foro; w^{ch}_π is only a kind of quit-rent and very inconsiderable." Forrest, Selections, Home Series, Vol. I, p. 51.]

ner in which this Port. term fôro was derived and interpreted by an eminent jurist like Sir Michael Westropp, a Chief Justice of Bombay, — an interpretation vitiated by the learned judge's ignorance of the Portuguese language: "Foras is derived from the Portuguese word fora, (Latin foras, from foris, a door) signifying outside. It here indicates the rent or revenue derived from outlying lands. The whole island of Bombay fell under that denomination when under Portuguese rule, being then a mere outlying dependency of Bassein. Subsequently the term foras was, for the most part, though perhaps not quite exclusively, limited to the new salt batty ground claimed from the sea, or other waste ground lying outside the fort, native town, and other the more ancient settled and cultivated grounds in the island, or to the quit-rent arising from that new salt batty ground and outlying ground. The quit-rent in Governor Aungier's convention called foras also bore the still older name of pensio (pensão, pension), and since that convention has been chiefly known by the name of pension. It was payable in respect of the ancient settled and cultivated ground only". Bombay High Court Reports, Vol. IV, 1866-67.

Dr. Gerson da Cunha (The Origin of Bombay, BBRAS. Vol. XX, Extra No., p. 228) has very lucidly and effectively pointed out the faults in the judge's derivations and the consequences they led to. "Fôro has no connection whatever with fôra, nor can the latter be derived from the Latin foris 'a door'. There are two foris in Latin, one a substantive and the other adverb. The first foris means 'a door,' and the second foris, with a grave accent on i means outside. It is from the latter that the Portuguese fôra is derived, which means 'without,' 'abroad' or 'out of doors'.....

"Fôro means a quit-rent payable by tenants to the King or the Lord of the Manor..... It also means 'court or hall of justice.' If fôro is to be traced to a Latin origin, it is more appropriate to derive it from forum, a public place, where public affairs, like the payment of rents or tributes, were transacted. A Latin word more appropriate to fôro is census, meaning valuation of estates or rating of property, and not registry or roll of the citizens, just as foral corresponds to liber censuum or 'book of rates to be paid.' It is in this sense that the Portuguese term pensão, derived directly from the Latin pensio 'payment,' is taken...

"From the assumption that fôro was derived from fôra, and the latter from the Latin foris 'a door,' the eminent Bombay Judge concluded that this derivation plainly indicated that the rent or revenue was drawn from the outlying lands alone, and that the whole island of Bombay fell under that denomination when under the Portuguese rule, Bombay being then a mere outlying dependency of Bassein. And in order to justify this far-fetched derivation of the word fôro from fôra, he confined the quit-rent to the outlying ground, and to the island of Bombay, as a mere outlying dependency of Bassein. But the fact generally known that fôro was imposed both on the inlying as well as on the outlying ground, and that it was not limited to Bombay, but was indifferently applied to Bassein, to Sálsette and to all other parts of that province, ought to have convinced him of the feebleness of his hypothesis." A male tenant who paid the quit-rent was spoken of as the foreiro, a female tenant as the foreira of the estate; thus, in 1727, D. Senhorinha de Souza e Tavora was the foreira of the village of Mazagon, and, in 1731 upon her demise, her grandson Martinho da Silveira de Menezes was entered in the records as the foreiro of the said village.

Another term intimately connected with fôro and frequently met with in a study of the old land tenures of Bombay is aforamento, which originally denoted the contract by which the grantor made a grant of a holding or estate to be held in possession and enjoyed by the grantee, either in perpetuity or for a specified period, upon his paying a certain annual fôro or quit-rent. In course of time the term came to denote the holding itself rather than the contract of the lease.

In Batta, gagap signifies, according to Joustra, “to follow a wrong way”.—Mal. gágap, ? kókok.

Haex has gagu, ‘to stammer’, and gagab, bergagab, ‘to prattle’. Dr. Schuchardt mentions the following Malay forms: gegeb, ‘to stammer’, gagap, gagáp, gegáp ‘confused’, and gugup, ‘murmur’. And he observes that “in Batavia gagu is equivalent to dumb”; but, in the vocabulary of the Portuguese dialect of Malay, he gives “oen-gagoe (= un gágu) ein Stotterer (orang gagoe)”. Kriolische Studien, ix.

Gonçalves Viana says: “The etymology of the Portuguese word gago is unknown: what Dr. Ad. Coelho gives us in his Diccionario Etymologico, viz., that it is from the Castilian gago, does not take us far, and besides this and the fact that it is little used in Castilian, it must be noted that in it the word has an entirely different meaning which corresponds more or less to ‘a snuffler’ rather than to ‘a stammerer.’ In the opinion of Cândido de Figueiredo, it is an onomatopoeic word. Gago, as a nickname or surname, appears very often in the old writers: Gabriel Gago in João de Barros, Fernão Gomes Gago in Gaspar Correia, Diogo Gago in Lembranças das Cousas da Índia.

Dr. Schuchardt maintains that gágap, because of its termination, is Malay and not of Portuguese origin; Gonçalves Viana eliminates it from his new list, revised and augmented, of Portuguese words introduced into Malay. But the reason alleged for this is not good as far as the form gágu in the other dialects is concerned. Matthes derives the Macassar gága from the Malay gágap.

It is not possible to explain why among the Indian languages Konkani alone should have gáy ('stammer'), with some derivatives of the word, all in common use, and even more current than the vernacular terms. Onomatopoeia is improbable in the case, because onomatopoeic words of this kind are, as a rule, common to Konkani and Marathi. Might it have been imported from Portuguese or, rather, from Malay through the intervention of Portuguese?

It is useful to note that in the Portuguese spoken in Goa the word cacoethe is used in the sense of 'stammering'. This term does not appear in the Diccionario Contemporaneo, nor in the dictionary of Cândido de Figueiredo; but it is mentioned by old lexicographers, like Morais, who says: "Cacoe-the (from Lat. cacoethes; from Gk. kakos 'bad' and êthos 'custom'). V. Cachexia. Bad bodily habit, like twisting the body, or similar movements or ugly gesticulations. An evil habit."¹

Yule does not look with favour upon Campbell's derivation of gallevat and is more inclined to trace it directly to the Portuguese galeota. —Tet. jentiu.—Gal. jentiu, sentiu.

The word 'gentoo' is used at the present time only in Madras of the Telugu-speaking Hindus, and of their language. But formerly it had a very wide meaning; the first digest of Indian legislation, which was compiled under the orders of Warren Hastings and published in 1773, has the title A Code of Gentoo Law.

[According to Yule, the reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara was dominant over a great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of the Hindus, were par excellence the 'Gentiles' and their language the 'Gentile language'. This appears to be a very plausible view, because of the intimate political and commercial relations that existed between the Portuguese in Goa and the Vijayanagar sovereigns.

Yule is led to believe that the English form 'Gentoo' did not come into general use till late in the 17th century, whilst Longworth Dames (Intro. Duarte Barbosa, p. lxiii) is of the opinion that in the 18th century 'Gentoo' was limited in its meaning to some of the lower castes in South India.

There is, moreover, no reason to doubt that the tila of the Sanskrit authors is the til of India to-day" (Watt, The Comm. Prod. of India (1908), p. 982). It is interesting to note how tila, which originally was the name of the sesamum plant, came to assume the generic significance of oil (taila). Watt observes: "It is certainly very remarkable that few, if any, of the early European travellers in India, such as Garcia de Orta, Linschoten, etc. etc., make mention of this plant or its oil". Globo (a spherical glass bowl used as a candle-holder). Konk. glób, galób.—Sinh. golóva.—Tam. galobei.

Sinhalese has gôla (Sansk.), 'globe in general, sphere,' which could give gólava, but not golóva, where the v takes the place of b.

Goiaba (Psidium guajava). ? Tam. goyá palam (lit. 'guava fruit or Goa fruit'?). It is also called pêrá.—? Tel. gōvā-pandū (pandū = fruit).—? Anglo-Ind. guava.—? Indo-Fr. gouave, goyave, goyavier.—| Mal. kuy-ávu (Rumphius).—Mol. guay-áva, goyávu (idem) |.—Nic. koyanva.—Tet., Gal. koyabas.—Malag. guavy. [In modern Arabic this fruit is called jūwáfa, Arabicised from 'guava.' See JRAS, July, 1927, p. 560.]

Just as the Portuguese called bananas figos ('figs'), so likewise they gave the name pera ('pear') to the guava, when they introduced it into India; and just as subsequently the word banana made its way into India, so likewise did goiaba or goiava. But have banana and goiaba, as a matter of fact, been introduced from Portuguese into Anglo-India and Indo-French? It appears that the Tamil goyá and the Telugu gōvā are for 'Goa'. [An exact parallel of the Tam. and Tel. names is found in one of the Bengali names of the fruit góaāchiphal, which obviously means 'fruit from Goa'.] See pera and banana.¹

[The guava tree is a native of South America now naturalised and largely cultivated throughout India. It was, in all probability, introduced into this country by the Portuguese.]

Gola (collar of a coat). Konk. gól; vern. term. galó.—Tam. golla.

Goma (gum). Konk. góm; vern. terms ból, chík.—Tet. goma.—Jap. gomu (perhaps from English). Arabiya gomu, gum Arabic.

Bug. guléta.—Tet. gorgoleta, ? gargó; vern. term dardón.—Gal. gorgoleta.¹

[The Portuguese word is itself derived from gorja, an archaic term, meaning 'throat', and the pitcher perhaps gets its name from the gurgling sound made in the throat when the water poured out of it into the mouth is drunk, as Indians do, without touching the spout with their lips. Linschoten (Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 207) and

¹ Some of the Indian languages give the guava the name 'jambo.'

[The Port form goiaba is derived from guayaba by which name the fruit was known in Brazil and from where it was introduced into India. The name pera ('pear'), which the Portuguese first gave it because of its resemblance to that fruit, has its counterpart in the Hindustani name for the guava, āmrūd (Pers.), which means 'a pear'. In Gujarat the fruit is also called jam, and jāmrūd, the latter, perhaps, a combination of jam and āmrūd.]

Mal. gárdu, gárdu.—Sund. gárdu.—Jav. gárdu, gérdu, grédu.—Tet., Gal. guarda.—Ar. virdiyán (from the Italian guardia, says Belot). In Javanese it is also employed as a verb, in the sense of 'to place guard'.

Molesworth observes that the word is met with in the most ancient Marathi documents and does not regard it as foreign; but he does not say whether the documents are anterior to the sixteenth century. He adds that it denotes especially the infantry soldier employed to guard the person of the Peshwa or other Raja. But Wilson derives it from the English 'guard' and remarks that it is obsolete. [It is well known that Portuguese military officers were employed in the Peshwa's armies, and it is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that guarda and other military terms such as coronel, ronda, tronco found their way through them into Marathi.]

Yule and Burnell, however, say that the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu giḍaṅgi, in Tamil kiḍaṅgu, signify 'a place where goods lie,' from kiḍu, 'to lie'. It appears in Sinhalese also as gudāma. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India.

[With regard to the Anglo-Ind. jill-mill, Yule also makes an alternative suggestion that it might be the Hindi jhilmilā which seems to mean 'sparkling', and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. This is also, according to Crooke, the view of Platts (A Dict. of Urdū, Classical Hindī, and English).]

Jangada (a raft; two boats lashed together, with a plank-laid across them). Tul. jangálu, jangalu, jangáru.—Anglo-Ind. jangar.

Cândido de Figueiredo derives jangada from jangá (janga, according to other dictionary-writers), "a small vessel worked by oars in former times." But Yule and Bunnell give as its source the Tamil-Malayal shangāḍam, transcribed as zángara in the Periplus Maris Erythrei, of the first century. Konkani and Marathi also have sāngad in the same sense, derived from the Sansk. saṅghaṭṭa, 'junction, union, cohesion', which is without a doubt related to shangāḍam. Many of the old Portuguese writers regard the word as foreign.¹

1 "Vasco da Gama sailed with our men in two almadias ('canoes'), which were fastened together, forming, what in that country is called, a jangada." Castanheda, I, ch. 16.

"They had constructed a jangada of pieces of wood, and of planks which were ready at hand, and fastened them with the ropes of the sails." Fernão Pinto, ch. clxxix.

"And Pulatecão got aboard a jangada which was made up of many small boats fastened together

[For the seven different acceptations in which jangada is employed by the old Portuguese writers, see Glossario, p. 482, and Contribuições etc., p. 138. Yule regards the term of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus. But as the Malayalam chaṅgāḍam is, as has been noted above, affiliated to the Sansk. saṅghaṭṭa, (from the verb saṅghat), it is scarcely correct to regard jangada as a purely Dravidian word.]

They crossed the river in jangadas made of timber and branches of trees which a Jew had gone in advance to get ready." Id., IV, p. 373.

"We therefore set out to look for a ford through the fierce current, but could find none, and so decided to make a janguada or raft of big logs firmly bound together with grass ropes." Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 105. The editor Lt.-Col. Luard, hazards the opinion that janguada may be the Hindi word chaughada or changaḍa, a raft made of bamboo frame supported on earthen pots, the Portuguese word being a corruption.]

There is another word jan-jada [in Anglo-Ind. jançada], of Malabar origin, which denotes a guide in the Nair country who escorted and guarded travellers from one place to another.¹ See under Naire.

[This word too is from shaṅgādam and its application to the Nair guides is derived from the ideal of the moral bond, close and indissoluble, between the guide and his employer.]

jugum, 'a yoke'), which signifies 'a yoke', and also 'one of the ages of the world.' But Wilson, more plausibly, connects juá with the Sansk. dyuta, 'a game.' Reeve likewise attributes to Sanskrit the Kanarese words, but does not mention their source-word. Favre, following Newbranner Van der Tuuck, connects the Malay júdi with the Sansk. yodhī; but he does not explain how the word, in passing over to Malay, lost its meaning of 'warrior' and acquired that of 'game of dice and of chance', seeing that, phonetically, yodhī could give júdi just as yoga, 'union' (if not yuga), gave júga.

The verb jogar, according to the regular law, became changed in the Portuguese dialects of Asia into jugá, which, with the loss of the intervocalic g, became juá or juvá. Cf. Hindust. jūá, 'a yoke', from the Sansk. yuga; Mar. julá, 'twins', from the Sansk. yugala; Konk. mūi (or mūy), 'ant', from the Mar. munḡi.

The d that is to be found in some of the languages may have been intercalated in order to remove the hiatus, or makes its appearance because of the influence of jugador, or of the Sansk. dyuta, 'a game of chance', the intervocalic t being changed into d. Cf. Konk. kāpaḍ, 'a saree, or cloth which constitutes the main part of a woman's dress', from the Sansk. karpata; máḍ, 'coco-nut palm', from mahātāla; cheḍó, 'boy,' from cheṭa.

It is, however, a matter for wonder that the Portuguese word should have penetrated so thoroughly into so many languages (in many of them, as is to be expected, mediately), and produced so many forms.

Games of chance, especially those of dice, have, in India, been indulged in from Vedic times, as is evidenced by: 'The Lament of the Gambler' (Rigveda, x, 34)¹; the disastrous contest of Yudhisthira; and the celebrated episode of Nala, one of the oldest and most beautiful in the Mahābhārata. The Yajurveda ironically calls confirmed gamblers 'pillars of the gaming-house', sabhāsthānu. Sir Arthur Macdonell observes that the principal social recreation of men in Vedic times, when they came together, was the game of dice, which were made from the nuts of [the Vibhidaka tree] Terminalia bellerica. The moralists of that age held dice, wine, and wrath as the principal causes of sin. And Manu prohibits gaming, even as a pastime, and desires that the king should mete out to the gambler corporal punishment.

It is probable that the Portuguese introduced new games, and that either they or their descendants popularised the game of dice, which had fallen into disuse, thanks to civil and religious legislation. The word dado ('dice') has been adopted in Konkani, Sinhalese, Malay, Javanese, and Sundanese.¹

The Sansk. dyuta could also have been corrupted into jūda or jūdi. Cf. Konk. uzó 'fire', from Prakrit vijju, Sansk. vidyut, which also gave viz, 'lightning-bolt', in Marathi and Konkani. And Bisnāgar or Bisnaga, of the old Portuguese chroniclers, is a corruption of Vijayanagara ('City of Victory') or of Vidyānagara ('City of Wisdom'), both names being applied to the capital of Narsinga.

It appears that the Sinhalese sūdu is in place of jūdu in the other languages and is derived from the Portuguese word. The Malayal. chūdu does not present great difficulty. Cf. chenel, chenarel from Port. janela ('a window'), side by side with janel. Cf. also the Port. jaca from the Malayal. chakka: jagra, from the Malayal. chakkara, Sansk. śarkarā.

Gonçalves Viana.

[In Pyrard's Dictionary of Some words of the Maldivé Language (Hak. Soc., Vol. II, pt. II, p. 414) occurs lancia as meaning 'lance'; its modern equivalent is lonsi; both terms are undoubtedly of Port. origin.]

Logan Pearsall Smith, Words and Idioms (1925), p. 17. This view is based on the O.E.D. which opines that launch is probably derived from Malay. Cândido Figuiereido, in the Novo Dicionario, refers it to Castilian lancha. Gonçalves Viana, an acknowledged authority on the influence of Portuguese on Malay vocabulary, does not dispute in his Apostilas Figuiereido's derivation of the word.

Spanish dictionaries trace lancha to Lat. planca. Wilkinson (Malay Eng. Dict.) derives the Malay lancha from Portuguese. On the other hand, the Portuguese dictionaries of Lacerda, Morais, and of Eduardo Faria, are inclined to connect the Port. word with the East. The Diccionario Contemporaneo, at present regarded as most authoritative, however, says that the derivation of the word is uncertain. The early Portuguese writers speak of lanchara (the correct Malay form is lancharan, 'a swift ship of war, a kind of Malay cruiser'), lanchuem ('a light and small Chinese vessel'), and also lantea ('a large oared barge or cargo boat'), and it is not surprising if the Portuguese lexicographers were led to assume that lancha was either a contraction or transformation of one of these terms. Yule says that he cannot identify lantea, but Dalgado (Glossario) seems to think it is the Malay lantey 'a storey or raised place,' which the lantea would be sure to have. Malay owes her names for several kinds of ships, not to speak of many naval and sea-faring terms, to Portuguese. See fragata, fusta, galé, galeão.]

Persian lashkarī from lashkar, 'an army'.

[Yule remarks: "The word lascār or lāscār (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of lashkarī in the forms lasquarin, lascari, etc., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskār has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape." The early Portuguese writers distinguished between lascar and lascarim. The former they used in the sense of 'an Indian seaman or marine', perhaps, because in the Indian languages laškar was used as a collective noun to denote 'the entire crew'.¹

Auction-sales took place very largely among the Portuguese, when one of them died or was transferred from one place to another. The Dutch traveller Linschoten (1598) is a witness to the fact that even the effects of a Viceroy were disposed of by auction. There were in the city of Goa signboards with the following inscription "The auction-sale which is held every morning in the Rua Direita ('The Straight Street') of Goa."¹

The Portuguese word comes from the Arabic leimún, or limún (Pers. limú), which, in its turn, comes from India, Sansk. nimbūka. It appears that from this last are derived almost all the Indian forms, the n being changed into l.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form is liman, 'a lime, lemon, or orange'. The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form. I feel sure that limau, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe." The Ency. Brit. (14th ed.) says that the lemon which seems to have been unknown to the ancient Greeks and Romans was introduced by the Arabs into Spain between the 12th and 13th centuries. In 1494 the fruit was cultivated in the Azores, even then subject to Portugal. After all this evidence, it is scarcely credible that the Portuguese should have derived limão from Malay. The O.E.D. traces 'lemon' to the Arabic leimûn; there is, therefore, all the more reason for assuming that the Portuguese also derived the word from the same source.

But is leimun an Arabic word and is it correct to hold the view generally accepted that the lemon is indigenous to Arabia? Or is it more correct to hold with V. Hohn, quoted by Yule, that the fruit and its name leimun are of Indian origin? It would appear to us that the citations furnished by Prof. S. H. Hodivala (Notes on Hobson-Jobson in The Indian Antiquary, Vol. LVIII, 1929) go to prove conclusively that the Arabs became acquainted with the lemon only in the 10th century and it was then known in Sindh as laimun.¹

Besides giving it the meaning of 'an arbiter' and 'an umpire,' the author says it is the name of some arbitration courts lately established in Poona and some other districts to decide civil claims 'without the expense of resorting to the courts established by government. As arbitration courts are, at the present time, claiming an unusual amount of interest, it is, we trust, not irrelevant to describe the constitution of the 'Lawad Courts': "A set of rules has been framed defining the constitution and function of the courts. The members are drawn for the most part from the class of pleaders, traders, and retired government officials. They agree to serve as arbiters in turn for a week at a time. They receive no remuneration. The arrangements of the court are in the hands of a secretary, who, in each week, chooses two members to act as umpires. Each court has a staff of clerks and messengers. mascaret (used for the bore in the Seine).

This is what the author has to say about this curious word in his Glossario: "The origin of this word is not quite clear. It is generally supposed to be the Sansk. makara, the name of a mythological monster, and also of the zodiacal sign Capricorn. This designation would not be at all inapt if the monster were regarded as the author of the phenomenon.

"But none of the Indian languages actually employs the term makara to denote the phenomena referred to.

Duarte Barbosa, ed. Dames, Vol. I, p. 138.]

["I was advised by the people of the place to unload the ships, so that they might belight when the flood tide came, for they would be destroyed if they were laden and had to meet the full force of the macareo." Castanheda, Historia, VIII, ch. 107, in Glossario.]

["The sea-coast in some parts of this kingdom (of Cambay) extends over two and three leagues, and with the flood tide there comes a wind with such suddenness that a man, no matter with what speed he runs, cannot save himself from the macareo." Damião de Góis, Chronica de D. Manuel, III, ch. 64.]

There are other names employed to do this, like Ghora ('The Horse') in Gujarati, Mendha ('The Ram') in Hindi, and it is, therefore, not unlikely that formerly in some part of India makara, which ordinarily means 'a crocodile,' had been used to designate this phenomena.

"Yule, however, throws doubt on this explanation because French has macrée and mascaret, in addition to barre, evidently the same as the English 'bore'. But there is no evidence to show that these words have existed prior to the Portuguese discoveries in the East, because no authorities earlier than the sixteenth century are quoted. The etymology of these words is unknown. Littré does not suggest any which appears plausible. He does not give reasons for the diversity of forms or for their existence side by side with barre, which is supposed to be older. Nor is there any explanation to show how it is that the French word crossed over to India, if, to judge from the accounts of the Portuguese chroniclers, the phenomenon and its name were unknown in Portugal.

"Gonçalves Viana (in Palestras Filológicas) has pointed out most clearly that, phonetically or morphologically, neither macrée nor mascaret could be converted into macaréu, and he came to the conclusion that "the three vocables, mascaret, macrée, and macaréu are independent of each other, and that their formal and phonic coincidences are merely fortuitous."

"I am almost convinced, however, that the French changed the Port. macaréu, first, into the form macrée, and, afterwards, into the more cultured mascaret, in the same way as they changed the Portuguese pateca (q.v.) into pastèque; mordexim (q.v.) into mort-de-chien; bicho do mar (q.v.) into biche-de-mer; pau de águila (see águila) into bois d'aigle. Jancigny¹ would not have used in 1854 maquerie, if the other forms had been well-known in his time.

"... The explanation that I would offer with regard to this term is that the people of Cambay might have told the Portuguese, eager to know the cause of this strange happening, that it was due to the makaró (the vulgar form in Gujarat) who came to devour ships and men, for in popular tales similar performances are ascribed to the monster."

Though the name, in the vernacular form magur, is given to the crocodile, the Makara, the fabulous sea-serpent, the vehicle of Varuna, the god of the ocean, is represented in sculpture with the head and forelegs of an antelope, and the body and tail of a fish. If the forelegs of the antelope are intended to connote speed, and the tail of the fish the marine character of the monster, might not the bore, the special feature of which is the rapidity of its approach, have appropriately suggested to the popular imagination the picture of this monster? Longworth Dames (in Duarte Barbosa, Vol. I, p. 138) has collected the more important references to the bore or macaréu in the Gulf of Cambay from as early as the Periplus down to Forbes in his Rās Mālā. Heber (in his Journal of a Narrative, 1828, Vol. I, p. 81) describes a bore on the Ganges.]

Machila ('a sort of a hammock-litter used as a substitute for palanquin'). Konk. māchīl, māñchīl.—Tul. manchilu.—Anglo-Ind. muncheel, manjeel (us. on the Malabar coast).—Tet. machila.¹

The original word is the Malayal. manjil, from the Sansk. mañcha. The word has been introduced into Portuguese Africa.

"The only species of conveyance used by the rich are the palanquins, or rather covered machilas." Cottineau de Kloguen, Bosquejo hist. de Goa, p. 163.

[The author's subsequent investigations appear to have led him to quite the opposite view, viz., that the word was an importation into India from Africa. This is what he says in the Glossario: "As regards its etymology, Konkani has māchīl or māñchīl, which passed into Tulu in the form māñchilu; but it is not a vernacular word. Yule and Burnell derive the Anglo-Indian muncheel or manjeel from the Malayalam mañjil, which in its turn is from the Sansk. mañcha, 'bed, platform'. Mañjil is not to be met with in all dictionaries which, however, mention mañcham and mañchakam. Wilson does not insert it in his Glossary of Indian Terms by the side of doli and palki. Of the authorities cited in Hobson-Jobson only one refers to Malabar, and is dated 1819. Moreover, it is not clear how the Sansk. mañcha, which passed into almost all the Neo-Aryan languages ipsis literis, assumed only in Malayalam the form mañjil and a very peculiar meaning, synonymous with andor (q.v.) and 'palanquin,' which terms are also to be found in the same language, in addition to another, viz., dayaman.

"If Portuguese colonial history were to be examined, it will be found that machira, as the name of a textile and of a species of litter, is very old in West Africa, where it is still in vogue in the vernacular languages in both these senses. It is, therefore, logical to conclude from this that the term was brought into India from Africa where it was applied to a litter different from the andor".

Machira in West Africa is used in the sense of (1) 'a litter,' and (2) 'of a thick cotton-sheet woven in the country'.¹ The latter, which is the earlier acceptation, gradually developed into the former, as the earliest means of transport was a piece of canvas, the two ends of which were tied to a pole. In course of time, this crude kind of hammock-litter developed into the more comfortable machilla or Anglo-Indian 'munchel'. Vieyra mentions machira and gives it the meaning of 'a sort of cloke or upper garment worn by the Caffres,' presumably the same as the hand-spun textile mentioned above.

Whitworth says that 'manchial' is a Portuguese corruption of Hindust. manzil, which he describes thus: "A stage, a station; thence the Goanese word manchial, a litter. Also a house, a palace." This is an instance of the perils attendant on discovering etymologies by paying more regard to the sound or form of words rather than to what is known to-day as 'semantics,' the study of the meanings of words.]

'small mother'), the wife of the youngest uncle. Some of the Portuguese dialects of India have māe-tia, in the sense of 'paternal aunt.' See pai.

The Konkani māy is from the Sansk. mātā: it is used in ecclesiastical idiom. Māy (or māmy) for 'mother-in-law' is not from Portuguese; it is the feminine of māmv, 'father-in-law.'

The word is derived from the Malayal. maṇṇaṭṭān, fem. aṇṇaṭṭī. It is used in Asio-portuguese. There is a place at Macau which is called anque dos Mainatos ('The Washermen's Tank.')

[The Portuguese carried the name mainato to Ceylon and applied it to the washermen there, so that Pieris Jeylon, I, p. 513) says: "The word mainato is used among the Washer caste even in remote villages of the seven isles, as a proper name."

Etymologically, mandarim has nothing to do with mandar ('to command'); it is a corruption of the Neo-Aryan (from Sansk.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a minister of state,' [māntari, in Malay]. The change of t into d and the dissolution of the compound consonant tr may be due to the influence of mandar or,

[In Hobson-Jobson will be found a number of quotations in support of the 'old and persistent mistake' made by otherwise unimpeachable authorities that mandarim is formed from the Port. mandar, 'to command'. Even Wedgwood (A Dict. of Eng. Etym.), in the first edition, explains and derives the word thus: "A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us

The etymon of the word is the Tamil mānkáy, which is, properly speaking, the name of the fruit when green, which when ripe is called mam-palam. Both the words have been introduced into Malay: manga in Malacca, Singapore, and Sunda, and memplam in Penang, Achem, and Batta.

In Konkani, māngád is 'a conserve made from mangoes'.

[Crooke in Hobson-Jobson quotes W. W. Skeat's opinion: "The modern standard Malay word is manga, from which the Port. form was probably taken." But Malayal. has mānga, and it is more probable that the Portuguese who borrowed so many words from the Malabar country, with which they first came into contact, carried the word to Malacca and gave it to Malay. Yule very properly says: "The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. The close approximation of the Malay mangka to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malacca. But we see manga already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar."

The cultivation of the mango, especially in the western parts of India, owes a great deal to the Portuguese and to the religious orders in Goa, particularly the Jesuits, who had, as a rule, extensive orchards around their monasteries. Owing to their efforts, the Goa mango acquired a great reputation which is attested to by Bernier (1663), Fryer (1673), Hamilton (1727), and other travellers (see below).¹ But da Orta tells us in

From this it would follow that the mango in Goa must have been brought to a state of perfection during the hundred years which followed the publication of the Colloquies. Da Orta himself had a celebrated mango-tree in his island of Bombay which used to yield

From the Marathi-Konkani munḡús or mungas, Sansk. aṅḡśha. [Yule derives it from Telugu, mangīsu, or mungīsa; Crooke says that Platts very doubtfully derives it from Sansk. makshu, 'moving quickly'. In Ar. it is binī 'arūs, 'daughter of the bridegroom,' in Egypt kitt or katt Farāūn, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, II, 369).]

[Da Orta (Col. XLII, ed. Markham, p. 336) describes unmistakably the Indian mongoose, but does not give it that name, but calls it quīl or quirpele. From this it must be concluded either that manguso or mongus had not then acquired much currency in the Konkan, or that the creature had been first described or pointed out to the naturalist by one who had known it in the Tamil country, and who, therefore, gave it the names it has in that language. "Kīri, kiripillei, the Tamil name of the mongoose," says Prof. H. Kern (Linschoten, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 104, n.). Da Orta refers to the mongoose in connection with his interesting dissertation on Pao de Cobra, or 'Snakewood'. This is what he says: "In the island of Ceylon, where there are many good fruits, forests, and beasts for the chase, there are yet many of those serpents vulgarly called cobras de capello.... Against these God has given this Pao de Cobra. It is found to be good against snake bites because in that island there are small beasts like ferrets which they call quīl. Others call them quirpele. They often fight with these serpents. When one of them knows that it must fight with them, or fears that it may have to, it bites off a piece of this root

"Its Telugu name is mangīsu, from which is derived mongús (as João Ribeiro writes it), and the mongoose of Anglo-India, the mangouste of the French, and other forms." Conde de Ficalho, Col. xlii, [p. 188.]

and rubs its paws over it, or rather rubs its paws which are wet with the juice over its head and body and over those parts which he knows the cobra is likely to bite when it springs. It then fights with the cobra, biting and scratching it until it is dead. If it does not succeed in killing the cobra, or if the snake should prove more powerful than its antagonist, the quil or quirpele again rubs itself against the root and returns to the combat, and at last conquers and kills its enemy. From this the Chingallas took an example, and saw that this root would be good against the bites of cobras. The Portuguese believed the good things that the people of the country said about the root and in time they gained some experience about it founded on reason.... Many Portuguese keep these mungoose in their houses, tamed and domesticated, to kill the rats, and to fight the cobras de capello, which the Yogis bring who seek for charity.... Of this snakewood there are three kinds in Ceylon..."

Deadly combats between the cobra and the mungoose, like those between the Egyptian 'ichneumon,' who also belongs to the Herpestes family, and the asp, go back to a very remote antiquity. They are mentioned in the Atharva Veda, in Panchatantra, and Hitopadeśa. But is there any warrant for the belief that the mungoose secures immunity from the snake's poison by means of certain roots or herbs? In the opinion of a competent investigator and observer like Blandford, the naturalist, the frequent triumphs of the mungoose over the cobra are the result of the former's bristly coat into which the fangs of the snake can only penetrate with difficulty, the hardness of its skin, and, above all, its cunning and dexterity in warding off the attack of the cobra and its patience in waiting for an opportunity to seize the cobra by its occiput, thereby rendering its poisonous fangs harmless. The claims of snake charmers to immunity, because of this very snakewood or root which they allege they carry about their person, are equally unfounded. Their secret of success, even when they handle cobras whose fangs have not been removed, appears to consist in their energetic decisiveness of manner and in the rapidity of their movements which completely dominate the reptile. That their pretences to immunity are hollow is proved by numerous reported instances of snake charmers succumbing very quickly to the bite of a cobra, especially when, trusting to their own devices, they will not avail themselves of scientific remedies.

What are the 'snakewoods' to which da Orta refers? One of these, which he says is called in Ceylon rannetul, has been definitely identified with the Rauwolfia serpentina, Benth., and Ficalho believes that it is the chātrākī mentioned in Amarakośa as one of the herbs used as an antidote by the nakula or the mungoose. The others are supposed to be the Strychnos colubrina, Linn., and the Hemidesmus indicus, R. Brown, or Asclepias pseudosarsa, Roxb. .]

It is, however, possible that manilla derives its origin from maneri, which in Marathi and Konkani is the name of 'a vendor of jewels,' Sansk. manikāra. [See cobra manila.]

Mão ('a measure of content and of weight'). Anglo-Ind. maune (arch.), maund (modern).¹

The origin of the Portuguese word is Neo-Aryan: Hindustani-Bengali man, which Shakespear derives from the Arabic mann; Marathi-Konkani maṇ, which Molesworth derives from the Sansk. māna, the root of which is mā, 'to measure,' or from Arabic.

of Comparative Philology) and Dr. Haupt (Die Sumerisch-akkadische Sprache) attribute to the word mana an Accadian origin. Yule and Burnell observe that in any case it was the Babylonian name for the eightieth part of a talent, whence it passed, with other Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world: Egyptian men or mna, Coptic emna or amna, Hebrew māneh, Greek mna, Roman mina; and through the medium of the Arabs, Spanish-Portuguese almena, old French almène,¹ [for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devie)].

The authors of Hobson-Jobson also say: "The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date".

In the Rigveda (VIII, 67, 2) there appears the word manā, which has given rise to heated discussion among orientalist. Is it a genuine Aryan word or of Semitic origin? What is its true meaning?¹

François Lenormant and some other writers regard the terms as identical, and adduce this fact, among other arguments, in proof of the very ancient relations that must have existed between India and Babylon, and also to point out traces of Babylonian influence on the Vedic poems.²

Max Müller (India, What can it teach us?) and other Sanskritists deny the Babylonian origin and the influence of the Semitic civilization upon ancient India; but there is no unanimity in their interpretation of the word.

[The recent excavations at Harappa in the Punjab and Mohenjo-Daro in Sindh have revealed the existence of an Indus Valley civilisation and culture which shows close resemblance with those of early Sumer and Babylonia. These discoveries indicate the existence of great cities with traces of luxury and refinement which suggest affinities with the Sumerian, or even an earlier, culture, Sir John Marshall going so far as to put their standard of life higher than anything contemporary in Mesopotamia or Egypt.]

The strophe is addressed to the god Indra, and is as follows: Ā naḥ bhara vyāñjanam gām āçvam abhyāñjanam.

Sáchā manā hiraṇyāyā.

The first part is translated: "Bring us a jewel, a cow, a horse, an ornament." The difficulty hinges on the second part which has been variously rendered. Grassman: Zugleich mit goldenen Geräth (=jointly with a vessel of gold). Ludwig: Zusammt mit goldenen Zierrath (=together with an ornament of gold). Zimmer: Und eine Manā gold (=and a manā of gold).¹

Max Müller impugnes the rendering with the instrumental case, because the preposition sachā never governs such a case, and referring manā to the Sansk. maṇi, Lat. monile, translates the verse: "Give us also two golden armlets". "To suppose," says he, "that the Vedic poets should have adopted only this word and only this measure from the Babylonians would be opposed to all the rules of historical criterion. The word manā never more appears again in all Sanskrit literature, no other Babylonian weight is ever mentioned in all Sanskrit literature and it is not probable that a poet who asks for a cow and a horse, should ask at the same time for a foreign measure of weight, that is, about 60 guineas."

Griffith follows this mode of rendering, but in place of the 'bracelets' he has 'rings'.¹

[The Portuguese converted man into mão, of which the

"Give us some cows, horses, perfumes, and ornaments of gold".

¹ The St. Petersburg Dictionary defines manā: "Ein bestimmtes Geräth oder Gewicht." And Capeller: "A certain vessel or weight of gold."

English made maune, and so probably by the influence of the old English word maund, "a kind of great Basket or Hamper, containing eight Bales, or two Fats," the modern word was derived. Mão in Portuguese means 'hand' and some of the older travellers like Linschoten, misled by this meaning of mão, rendered it as equivalent to 'hand'. The values of the 'maund' as weight vary greatly in different parts of the country. The standard maund in British India is 40 *ser*s, each ser being equal to 80 tolas or rupee-weights. from the Sanskrit mṛti, ‘death’. Favre suggests that it may be of Semitic origin, mant, ‘death,’ in Arabic. Malagassy must have received the word directly from the Malayan languages, much before Portuguese, or perhaps even Arabic, influence was felt in Malaysia. The term was current in the time of Fernão Pinto who writes (ch. 177: “Cahio morto, sem dizer mais que somente: Quita mate, ay que me matou” (“He fell dead, without saying anything but this: Quita mate, i.e., who is it that has killed me”).

kābārī (adj.), "relating to the last day of the month, due or payable on this day (salary, rent, etc.)."

In Konkani, kabār is very much used as equivalent to the Portuguese acabar ('to end').

[Brown suggests, as the etymon of majkabār, the Hindust. mās-ke-ba'ad, 'after a month'. Crooke, on the other hand, observes that, according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hindust. māsik-war or mās-kā-wār. But Prof. S. H. Hodi-vala (Notes on Hobson-Jobson) suggests that, "if 'Mascabar' is an Indo-Portuguese word for the last day of the month, it must be a corruption, not of mās-kā-bār,.... but of amās-ka-bār. Monção (monsoon). Konk. monsámv.—Anglo-Ind. monsoon.—Indo-Fr. mousson.—Siam. *monsúm.*¹

The source-word is the Arabic mausim, 'season of the year'

[Yule says: "Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger's) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word..... Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes moução, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some Skeat traces 'monsoon' from Ital. monsoe. But the O.E.D., with more reason, states that it is adopted from Dutch, monsooen—soyn, which, in its turn, was adopted from the Port. monção in the 16th century. At the present time, both according to Anglo-Indian and Indo-Portuguese usage, 'monsoon,' or monção means 'the season of the rains,' which, as a rule, lasts for four months and is a period during which sailing vessels do not put out to sea. We also speak of 'the monsoon having burst,' which is another way of saying that the rains have begun. The 'rainy season' was also called inverno ('winter') by the Portuguese, and this practice was followed by the other European nations and lasted right up to the eighteenth century. 'Inverno' is even to-day used of the 'rainy season' in the Portuguese possessions in India. See quotation from Correia under mordexim; also Hobson-Jobson, s.v. winter.]

The Portuguese word represents the Marathi-Konkani modṣi, which, even at the present time, is the term used of indigestion, especially in the case of children. [See colera.]

[The Marathi-Konkani word is from modṇem or modṇk, 'to break up, to sink, to collapse'. Dalgado (Glossario) thinks it very probable that in former times this term, which is used of indigestion, was employed, by a kind of euphemism, to denote cholera, it being regarded as inauspicious in India to mention the fell disease by its proper name. There is a great deal to be said in favour of this view as, even at the present day among the common people, it is regarded as unlucky to speak of a man as having been 'bitten by a snake,' but it is believed to be more favourable to his recovery if he is described as having been 'scratched by a thorn.' Yule observes that the Gujarati forms of modṣi appear to be morchī or morachi. To this heat is felt, and by this the pain is allayed and the discharge and vomiting stopped." Manucci, Storia do Mogor, ed. Irvine, Vol. II, p. 169.]

Dalgado says that Gujarati has no r, and morchī cannot be traced back to mōḍṣi. Portuguese has no d cerebral, and the sound which comes nearest to it is r, as is seen in the case of areca from adekka. The Portuguese writers of the 16th century had very fine ears and they noticed that their morxi did not represent the exact transcription of modṣi which is trisyllabic, the a of the second syllable (ḍa) being very silent or almost mute, and, therefore, very naturally added de to r, and in this way evolved the transcription mordexi, which after prolonged use became mordexim and existed side by side with the correct transcription morxi. During two centuries and more this word (mordexim) was employed by the Portuguese—and by all the Europeans who travelled to India—to designate cholera: at times written mordicin by the Italians, as by Carletti: other times mordisin by the French, as by Pyrard; sometimes mordexi by those who wrote in Latin, as by Bontius. Subsequently, the French thought of giving the word a meaning, and, combining the sound of the word with the horrors of death from the disease, called the malady mort-de-chien. In the Lettres Edifiantes for the year 1702 there occurs the following phrase, which helps to fix the time of the adoption of the new name: "This great indigestion which is called in India Mordechín, and which some of us French have called Mort-de-Chien" ('Dog's Death'). Although ridiculed, this name was adopted, not only in French works, but also in books written in other languages, and there was even an Englishman who literally translated the name thus: "The extraordinary distempers of this country are the Cholick, and what they call Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron." See Ficalho, Colloquies da Orta, Vol. I, p. 275. The opinion of the 'Englishman' quoted above is taken from Acct. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roque's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, etc., E.T. London, 1726. p. 155, cit. in Hobson-Jobson. The history of the various transformations through which this interesting word has passed would be incomplete if we did not refer to Anderson (English in Western India, etc., p. 62) who by a curious metathesis having changed chien into Chine and, therefore, mort de chien into mort de Chine ('Chinese death') says: "The disease which was prevalent in the country, and especially fatal in Bombay, was called by the Portuguese practitioners of medicine 'the Chinese death,' or colic."]

Barbosa (1516) uses the word in this latter acceptance. ² The change of r into l in Pidgin-English is normal.

[All Mohammedans without exception were called by the Portuguese Mouros or Moors: this name of their nearest Moslem neighbours and one time conquerors was extended by them to all the followers of Islam, and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mohammedan, passed to the Dutch and the English. The use of the term in its comprehensive sense is well brought out by Barbosa (ed. Dames, Vol. I, p. 119): "The Mouros of this kingdom (Cambaya) are fair in complexion, and the more part of them are foreigners from many lands, scilicet Turks, Mamalukes, Arabs, Persians, Coraçones, and Targimões (Turcomans); others come from the great kingdom of Dely, and others of the land itself."

Yule says that the use of the word Moor for Mohammedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground longer among the British soldiery, whilst Moorish, as an adjective, continued to be used up to a later date. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch colonies, the term Moorman for a Musalman is still in common use, and the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of a certain class of Mohammedans. Moro is still applied at Manila to the Mussulman Malays. Not only in Portuguese India, but wherever Portuguese is spoken in Asia to-day, the Mohammedan is called Mouro. The French in India have also adopted the use of this term in the same sense.]

in the sense of 'a deputy or delegate of the supreme chief', was directly taken from the Port. nababo. But in the Anglo-Indian vocabulary of the 18th century the name was also sarcastically employed to denote an Anglo-Indian who returned to England with an immense fortune from the East and affected a luxurious style of living. [Its exact equivalent is the Latin dux.] It is also the title of some kings,¹ and a title of honour among certain classes. [It was the title of the petty dynasties that arose in S. India on the downfall of the Hindu empire of Vijayanagar in the 16th century.] In Konkani it is the name of a catchpole or bailiff.

Naique in Indo-Portuguese had various meanings: captain or chief of indigenous soldiers, ordinarily called piães; a headman; an Indian inspector or supervisor.² sacred. It is possible that the Naga was at one time the totem of the tribe." Longworth Dames in Barbosa, Vol. II, p. 38, n.

Malabar being the country where the Portuguese first landed, fought many hard fights, and exercised considerable political and commercial influence, it is not to be wondered at that their chroniclers like Barbosa, Barros, Castanheda, and others should have devoted especial attention to this ruling caste in Malabar, and to the usages and customs, dress, bravery, and the knightly organisation of its members.

But, in the 16th and 17th centuries, the Portuguese also used nair in the very same sense in which they afterwards used cornaca (q. v.), viz., that of 'a mahout or elephant-driver', and the reason for this becomes obvious from the quotation below from Pyrard.¹

an image of the Virgin Mary, and, at other times, a Catholic Church, because in those parts of the country there are many churches dedicated to Our Lady of Miracles. The third meaning, in which the word is used, is that of money; the origin of this, in the speech of the Portuguese, is in all probability due to the image of bhagavatī or other divinity which was stamped on one side of the coin. See Hobson-Jobson, and Gonçalves Viana, Apostilas.

In Portugal, pagode is more used in the figurative sense of 'feasting and revelry'; but such a meaning is unknown in India. The natural explanation for this appears to be that this meaning was suggested by the feasts of the pagodas which are very pompous, and at times extravagant, especially to the eyes of a foreigner.¹

etc., (1916), and his Glossario, Vol. ii (1921). As his investigations therein, subsequent to those set forth in this work, throw new light on the origin of this intricate word, we present a résumé of them here. For good and various reasons he rejects the suggestions which would give it a Chinese, Portuguese or Persian origin, and definitely states that it appears to him that the original of pagode is the Sansk. term Bhagavatī, 'Durgā or Kālī'. Bhagavatī in the process of its transition from Sansk. to the Dravidian languages, in accordance with the usual phonetic laws, must become Pagavadi or Pagódi. With regard to the initial p for bh, we have Tamil pāṇḍam for the Sansk. bhaṇḍam, 'an earthen vessel'; Pirama for Sansk. Brahma; baspam or parpam for Sansk. bhasman, 'ashes'. With regard to d for t intervocalic, we have in Malayalam: pradi ('copy') for Sansk. prati, sammadi ('consensus') for Sansk. sammati, apakaḍam ('accident') for Sansk. apaghāta. It remains to justify the change of—ava to o. In this connection it must be noted that, whether the indigenous form was pagāṇvadi or pagudi, they would both sound to the ears of a stranger as pagôdi. The Indian v is a semi-vowel, equivalent to the English w, which with the short â preceding it would sound like au (as happens generally in Konkani) and would absorb the vowel following. Of such cases we have instances in the Tamil Paramechchuran, from Sansk. Parameṣvara, 'the Supreme Lord'; in the Neo-Aryan sona or sonem, from Sansk. suvarṇa, 'gold', in Dravidian honā or hūn. Moreover, the form pagodi exists in some of the Dravidian regions. In Coorg the people, according to Kittel, give to Kālī the title Pagôdi or Pavodi. Gundert mentions in his dictionary the Malayal. pagôdi (but writes it pakôti, according to the character of the language) as a synonym of Bhagavatī Durgā, from which he derives the Port. pagode. It is of no use to allege that bhagavat or bhagavatī is in no Indian language the name of 'a temple', and that it is in this sense of a temple that 'pagode' is generally employed, for it is not necessary to suppose, as Yule and other etymologists do, that the acceptation of 'temple' is the first and the most important one.

Historically, there is nothing to justify the view that in Portuguese the meaning of 'temple' must have priority over other acceptations. It is true that Barbosa and Corselli in 1516 use it in that sense, but there is very good reason for this. The Portuguese had the word idolo to denote 'the images of pagan cult'; it was a word very much used in that age. In an age of great religious fervour, such as the sixteenth century was, it would have been regarded as profanation to speak of the casas dos falsos deuses ('houses of the false gods') as temples or churches. Hence they were put to the necessity of employing pagode in that sense. In Chronica de Bisnaga (1525-1535) pagode, though used frequently in the sense of 'a temple', is employed five times in that of 'an idol' and not once as the name of 'a gold coin'. Duarte Barbosa who, according to Gaspar Correia, spoke 'the Malabar language' better than a native, says that only the prayer houses of a special caste, the Cuiavens, (supposed by Longworth Dames to be the potter caste called Kusavan) were called pagodes. The reason for this is, they were dedicated to Bhagavatī, which name, in the mouth of the people, would become Pagódi, and this is precisely the meaning that Gundert gives to Pagódi in Malayalam. From all this it is evident that the Portuguese took over the word as well as its two-fold acceptation from Dravidian sources and, in all probability, extended the use of the term to the gold coin varāha or hūn, because it bore on it the figure of Bhagavatī or some other divinity.

According to Sir Walter Elliot, "the village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durgā, or, as she is commonly called, simply 'Devi' (or Bhagavati, 'the goddess') . . . In like manner a figure of Durgā is found on most of the gold Huns, (i.e., pagoda coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was stamped upon it, would be told it was 'the goddess', i.e., it was 'Bhagavati'." (Hobson-Jobson).

The Jesuit, Fr. Francisco de Sousa, the author of Oriente Conquistado (1710), who had spent years in India and who, therefore, can be trusted to know what he is speaking about, says: "Pagode among the Portuguese in India signifies an idol, and a temple, and also a certain gold coin." The order in which he mentions these acceptations point to the chronological development or evolution of the various meanings of the word, all of which hinge on the primary one of 'idol'.

Though the Portuguese used pagode at first to denote a Hindu temple, in course of time, the term came to be used also of Buddhist and Mohammedan places of worship. Peter Mundy (Travels, 1608-1667) uses the term of a Chinese-Buddhist temple, which is otherwise generally called by Portuguese and other European travellers 'varela' (from Malay barhāla, 'an idol'), and Faria-y-Sousa (1674) speaks of a 'Pagoda of Mecca' (Hobson-Jobson). There is a similar confusion in Barbosa in one passage in which he calls a Hindu shrine a mesquita, i.e., 'a mosque.' (See under mesquita.)

The pagode or pagode de ouro ('gold pagode') as it was sometimes called, was current in S. India, and was originally equal to about 360 to 400 reis, but later on was worth as much as 12 xerafins (q.v.) or 1,200 reis. The quotations above from Bowrey and Hedges will show how the rate of exchange of this coin kept on constantly shifting.

Before concluding, it would be useful to review the different etymologies of 'pagoda' that have been offered and to give reasons for their rejection.

1. The Chinese words pao-t'ah, 'precious pile', and poh-kuh-t'ah, 'white-bones-pile'. This does not find favour at present with scholars of Chinese language and culture. Yule very properly says that anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology.

2. The Portuguese pagão ('pagan'), which Yule thinks may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda. But pagão into pagode would be a very singular mutilation of the Portuguese word in order to describe objects so very different. Again, the term pagão occurs but rarely among the early Portuguese writers, who use the word gentio (q.v.) in this sense.

3. The Sinhalese dágoba, 'Buddhist sanctuary'. It was believed that the transposition of the syllables of this word gives pagode; this is not so, it gives bágoda. But dágoba was not in use in Ceylon in the time of Duarte Barbosa (1516), nor had the Portuguese then any intimate contact with that island. The Portuguese first came to be acquainted with Buddhist temples and monasteries in Indo-China which they then called bralas (from the Malay barhāla), which afterwards became corrupted into rarelas.

4. The Persian but-kadah, 'idol-temple', proposed by Ovington, Littré, Devic, and Burnell. But phonetically but-kadah or but-kedah differs a great deal from pagode, and semantically does not offer reasons for all the acceptations of the word. Moreover, it is necessary to assume that the Portuguese received the term from the Mohammedans. See Dalgado, Contribuições, etc., p. 161 seqq.

tions as a corruption (tadbhāva) of the Sanskrit word. Could the Portuguese have carried the word to Malacca or did they receive it thence ?

[The author has devoted considerable attention and space to this word in his Contribuições, etc. (p. 73), wherein he suggests an answer to the query he puts in this book. He accepts that the Port. palanquim is derived ultimately from the Sansk. paryāṅka or palyāṅka, 'a bed', but maintains that there is no need whatever to suggest, as Yule does, that the Port. or Sp. palanque or palanca ('a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers') had any influence in determining the form palanquim, especially as regards the nasalisation of the second syllable. He says the Sansk. paryāṅka or palyāṅka is represented in Pali by pallaṅko, and in the Indo-Aryan languages such as Mar., Konk., Guj., (which also has paryāṅka) by palāṅg ('bed, sofa'). In the sense of 'litter', it is met with in all Indian languages, Aryan or Dravidian, under the forms pālki, pālkhī, pālgī, pallakki, pallakku, pallakkiya; and in Malayo-Javanese, pēlāngki, plāngki or palāngking.

The Port. palanquim, which in this form passed into the other European languages, is no doubt of Indian origin, but how are we to account for the two nasals pala(n)ki(m)? The nasal termination is easily explained by the well-known phenomenon in which the tonic i of the Indian languages becomes nasalised in passing over into Portuguese, as in chatim, lascarim, mandarim, Samorim, Cochim. The difficulty is to account for the medial nasal. If the Pali pallaṅko were accepted as the immediate source of the Port. word, the difficulty disappears; but Pali was scarcely ever a spoken language. Again, Sinhalese, which has been most influenced by Pali, has pallakki(ya). If it were possible to fix the birth place of the Port. vocable in Insulandia, the Malayo-Jav. palāngki, or, as Williamson has it, palangking, might be regarded as the source-word. But the vernacularity of the Malay word is open to doubt, nor is there evidence to show that it was current in those parts before the Portuguese arrival; again there are indigenous synonyms for palanquin, viz., kremun, tundu, usongon; joli which is Indian.

The form usually employed in Malayalam is pallakku, as in Tamil, or pallakki, as in Kanarese. But Gundert registers pallaṅkī, which appears to have the savour of Portuguese influence. But Tulu has palleṅki, side by side with pallaki, which squares neither with the Malayalan pallanki, nor the Port. palanquim, but with the English 'palanquin.' Moreover, the influence of Tulu on Portuguese is nil. It is extraordinary that none of the Indian languages should have preserved the original nasal which is found in palang, 'bed', of which pālki or pallaki have all the appearances of being diminutives, in the sense of 'a couch or little bed.' Normally, the diminutive should have been paṅgī or pallaṅkī. And in fact, Hindustani, Marathi and Gujarati have paṅgī, as a diminutive used depreciatively, in the sense of 'a small and ordinary bed.'

But Shakespear does not derive the Hindust. pālki, as he does palang, immediately from the Sansk. palyaṅka, but from the Hindi pālakī. Now, Hindi has also side by side with it the form nālakī, which appears to be due to the transposition of the medial nasal. From which it may be conjectured that the denasalization took place in Hindi and from it was transmitted to the other Indian languages.

The elimination of the nasal may also be explained by the law of least resistance, in view of the fact that the a which follows the l is surd in some of the Aryan languages and silent in others. The Sansk. maṁsa, 'flesh', becomes in Konk. and colloquial Mar. mās. For the same reason, the Sansk. ānanda is pronounced in Konk. anad, 'glory'.

Even if it were taken for granted that the n of the Portuguese word was not etymological, it is not necessary to have recourse to palanque or palanca to account for it. It may have developed of itself without outside influence, as has happened in the Port. words fiandeiro, 'spinner,' from fiar, 'to spin,' and lavandeira, 'washer-woman,' from lavar, 'to wash,' or in the Japanese words bôzu, 'priest,' changed into bonzu, and byobu, 'screen,' into biombo.]

Bowrey, The Countries, etc., Hak. Soc., p. 46. 'Palmero' in the above quotation, is, undoubtedly, the 'fan-palm'. 'Palmito' is here the wild date-palm, Phoenix sylvestris, which is very common in Gujarat. But the name is given to various varieties of the dwarf fan-palm. 'Palmito' in Portuguese is also the name by which the 'cabbage' or the edible heart at the end of the stem of a palm, whence the leaves spring, is called. "It is the eye of the coco-nut or its heart and the unexpanded mass of the very fine leaves that is called palmito and.... it somewhat resembles in taste white and very tender chestnuts.... In fact, the Portuguese chroniclers invariably employ palmeira to denote the coco-nut palm and when they wish to refer to the fan-palm or the Borassus flabelliformis, from the leaves of which strips for writing on are prepared, speak of it as palmeira brava (q.v.).

palmyra, quotes from Orta: "There are many palmeiras in the Island of Ceylon" (Col. XV), to support his view that the word stands for the Borassus flabelliformis, and to show that this palm was called by the Portuguese par excellence, palmeira or 'the palm-tree.' But in this he is mistaken, for, in almost all the places where the word occurs in the Colloquies, it is used to signify the 'coco-nut palm.' When Orta refers to Ceylon as being full of palms, he is merely stating a fact, viz., that in that island are to be found several varieties of the palm. He is using the term in the generic sense in which it was employed in Portugal. Here is Sir Emerson Tennent's evidence on this point: "But the family of trees which, from their singularity as well as their beauty, most attract the eye of the traveller in the forests of Ceylon, are the palms, which occur in rich profusion....; more than ten or twelve (species of the palm) are indigenous to the island" (Ceylon, I, 109).

It is an American term,¹ used in Cuba, probably introduced by the Portuguese together with the plant, as the Kanarese name parangi-hañṇu ('Frank or Portuguese fruit') seems to indicate. Linschoten (1597) thinks that it came from the Philippines to Malacca and from thence to India. In Siamese it is called lùk ma-la-ko, 'the fruit of Malacca', [and in Burmese himbawthi, which means 'fruit brought by sea-going vessels']. See Hobson-Jobson, Apostilas of Gonçalves Viana, [and also Skeat, Notes on English Etymology].

[The Portuguese introduced the 'papaya' into Africa and Asia. In Africa, it is reported to be very common in the Portuguese possessions, specially in Cape Verde Islands and in Angola. It must have been brought to India towards the close of the sixteenth century, for Linschoten (1597)¹ mentions it as one of the fruits of India and gives a very accurate description of the tree, but it is not referred to either by Orta (1563) or in the Āin-i-Akbarī (c.1590). In 1656 it was figured and described by Boym (Flora Sinensis, pl. A) as an Indian plant introduced into China, so that it must be regarded as another instance of the rapid dispersion of new plants after the discovery of America.¹

There can be no question about the home of this species being America, and it is, therefore, all the more curious to find American dictionaries referring its name to Asiatic sources. The Century Dictionary says: "Papaya, a name of Malabar origin. . . also written pawpaw". Webster referred it to Malay, but in the 1890 and subsequent editions he refers it to "the West Indies". According to Oviedo (1535), papaya is the name used in Cuba. Littré (see papayer) gives the Carib-bean form as ababai. The O.E.D. derives the word from Carib, but is at a loss to indicate the immediate source of the English forms papa, papaw, and pawpaw. Sir Richard Temple (Indian Antiquary, Vol. XXX, p. 552) says that "in the Madras Presidency it is known as 'poppoy' and usually so spelt in accounts and letters". 'Poppoy' could give

The O.E.D. connects the Anglo-Ind. forms with the Malay p(á)rā(h)ū, 'a boat, a rowing vessel', and says that the forms prow and proa are assimilated to the Eng. 'prow' and its Port. equivalent proa. Yule assigns to the word in European use a double origin: the Malayal. pāru, and the Malay prāu or prāhū. Dalgado (Glossario) maintains that the Port. derived their forms from the Dravidian paḍavu, and that the Malasian forms owe their origin to the Dravidian term. He is of the view that Yule's theory of a double origin is untenable, because, as he points out, pāru could not give the Port. parau or paró, and because the term was already known to the Portuguese before their conquest of Malacca. Both the forms could, however, be derived from paḍavu. See piroga, and, for citations, Ind. Antig., Vol. XXX, p. 161.

into pardão or pardao. The pardaus which were most and longest current in Goa were those which had been struck by the Vijayanagar sovereigns, because of the intimate political and commercial relations that then subsisted between Goa and the Vijayanagar court. Silver pardaos began to be coined in Goa towards the middle of the 16th century and are distinguished from the gold ones in as much as the former are referred to as pardau de tangas or pardau de larins or de xerafim. When the gold pardao went out of circulation, the silver pardao was worth 6 tangas or half a rupee, and the pardau de cobre ('copper pardao'), or more correctly the xerafim, 5 tangas or 300 reis. Yule says that at the close of the 16th century the gold pardao was worth 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d., but that by the first half of the eighteenth century the pardao had dwindled in value to 10½d. Yule, too, like Dalgado is inclined to accept the Arabic abūtāka or corruptly bātāka, the name given to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning 'father of window,' the scutcheon being taken for such an object, as the original of the Portuguese and Spanish pataca. But they do not appear to take into account the following considerations: The Ar. bātāka would not become in Port. and Sp. pataca, but remain bātāka for both Port. and Sp. possess a b sound, but if the original word was pataca, it would in passing over into Arabic become bātāka, for Ar. has no p sound, and the change of p into Ar. b is the rule when words are taken over into Ar. from other languages. See papuses and pateca. Pataca was originally used of a S. American silver coin, and the name was certainly carried from Spain to America, and, in the absence of any more convincing etymology, it might be safer to regard the term as Spanish. perhaps, pathmār is merely a variant of vātmār which is used in the same sense even to-day. There are instances in Konk. of the change of v into p.]

Garcia da Orta derives it from Malayalam [Col. on Betel, etc.] which Charles Brown admits but only as regards its meaning of 'a sailing vessel'. Molesworth derives the Marathi pātemārī, 'a native craft', from the Hindust. pātimārī, 'courier', but Hindustani dictionaries do not mention any such word.

["The principal difficulty consists in knowing where it was that the Portuguese first received the word. Hindust. and Mar. have patta, 'tidings, information', which with the addition of the suffix vār or mār could have given patamar, 'the bearer of tidings'. It is also worthy of note that Duarte Barbosa, speaking of Gujarat, says that among the Brahmins "there are others of low degree who act as messengers and go safely everywhere without molestation from any, even during war or from highway-men; these men they call Pateles". Now, patel, besides denoting the headman of a village, is in Gujarat also borne as a name by certain sub-divisions of castes, and by the Ahīrs and Bhoyars it is used as a title. Longworth Dames observes (Vol. I, p. 117): "It is probable that some men of these castes acted as messengers for the Brahmans in Barbosa's time". Patel, with an affix, var, for instance, or in Malayalam ar, could be transformed into patamar." [Ficalho, who is surprised that Orta should speak of the pateca as though it were unknown in Portugal, identifies it with the melancia, which he says was cultivated from immemorial times in the Mediterranean basin, and must, therefore, have been also cultivated in Spain and Portugal. To this Dalgado, in his Gonçalves Viana e a Lexicologia Portuguesa, says:

“In spite of Ficalho’s opinion to the contrary, it can be seen from António Tenreiro, from Garcia da Orta, and others that the water-melon was then little cultivated in the Iberic peninsula. The name which the Portuguese gave to the fruit in India is pateca, from the Ar. batīkh, which they probably heard used by the Arab traders in Malabar. As pateca, the fruit is even to-day known in the Portuguese speech current in Asia. Frei João dos Santos, however, speaks of the melancia (‘water-melon’) as a fruit, very common, in his time [1608], and it is, therefore, not improbable that the Portuguese who had sampled the fruit in India, had either introduced it into Portugal or extended its cultivation there, and that the popular form balancia was a corruption of the cultivated term melancia. Notwithstanding the fact that the Spaniards had sandia, a term received, according to Dozy, from the Ar. sindiya, and derived from Sindh in India, it cannot be said that they had given the fruit to the Portuguese, because, had they done so, its name would have accompanied it, and in Portuguese there is no word for it corresponding to sandia. According to the testimony of Pyrard de Laval, Bernier, and Tavernier, the fruit was also unknown to the French, their word for it pastèque being a corruption of pateca and imported from India.”]

“They ate nothing but the bran of the millet and the rind of patecas, which are like our water-melons.” João dos Santos, Ethiop. Or., II, p. 182.

The original of the Port. word appears to be the Ar. bat, 'drake, gander' (batak is the diminutive), also used in Persian and Hindustani.¹ It may be that batu has been derived directly from bat. The old Portuguese writers use adem for pato.²

[Gonçalves Viana is not disposed to accept the Arabic origin for pato and for the following reason: The change of b into p. In the Bulgar language the gander is called pátek or pátok, which is a derived form and presupposes the existence of an earlier one, pat; it is possible that the Ar. bat came to be written that way because of the absence of p in that language. In Persian the drake is also called bat, and it is probable that the Arabs imported either from Persia, Armenia or India the word which belongs to the stock of Aryan and not Semitic languages. In Armenia, too, it is called pat, or bad, according as the dialect which uses the word belongs to Europe or Asia.]

Did the word go from Portugal or did it come to Portugal from Malacca? The Portuguese dictionaries do not give the derivation of patuleia. Gonçalves Viana, however, presumes that it is patulé in the sense of 'rustic'.

It might have been brought from Asia by the Spanish gipsies and introduced into Castilian which employs it in the sense of 'irregular troops'.

[The Jesuits were so called in Goa from the famous College of St. Paul (consecrated on the 25th January, 1542, the day of the conversion of St. Paul) which they had there, and the name spread all over India with the extension of the missionary work of the order.

The Church of St. Paul, completed in 1602, was the seat of the Jesuit College at Macao; this church, according to the testimony of Père Alexandre de Rhodes (Voyages et Mis- sions, ed. 1884, p. 56, in Peter Mundy, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. III, pt. I, p. 163, n. 2.), was the most magnificent that he had seen, with the exception of St. Peter's at Rome, and from this Church and College the Jesuits in China derived the appellation 'Paulists', of which they appear to have been quite proud.¹

of the 'guava' in Hindustani, and amrud is the name of the 'pear' in Persian. In Hindustani and Bengali it is also spoken of as the saphari am (lit. the 'journey mango' or, rather, 'foreign mango', see Hobson-Jobson, s.v. ananas), corrupted into supāri ám, 'areca-mango'.

In Burma, the guava is called ma-la-kah-thí, 'the Malacca-fruit', and the guava-tree ma-la-kah-bin. Siamese has lùk fārǎng, 'fruit European', and tôn fārǎng, 'tree-foreign' (fārǎng=Frank).

The plant is indigenous to America and was introduced into India by the Portuguese, who, owing to its similarity, called the fruit pera, ('pear'), just in the same way as they called the fruit of the banana-tree figo ('fig').

In Africa also the term pera is used to denote the 'guava'.

In Konkani, perad (from perada in the Portuguese dialect of Goa) is a conserve prepared from guavas. See goiaba.

[A. Siddiqi (in JRAS, July, 1927, p. 560) says: "It is only in Urdú and also in certain other Indian languages that the name amrut is applied to guava. The reason is quite clear: guava became perfectly naturalised in India, where pear never thrived. The resemblance in shape and colour of guava to pear obviously led to the adoption of amruth for "guava"—most probably by the Persians or Moghuls naturalised in Northern India. In the South-Indian Urdú a "guava" is جام probably on account of its resemblance to a pear-shaped bowl".

Marathi and Gujarati use jamb and jam for the 'guava', perhaps because the shape of the latter is similar to that of the Eugenia jambos (Hindi gulab-jāman, 'rose-jāman'), which in its turn is in form like an apple or a pear.]

Peru (popular form perum, turkey). Konk. perúm.—Hindi, Hindust., Or., Beng., Ass., Punj. perú.—Khas. perú, pirú.

Gonçalves Viana calls into question the derivation of the fowl's name from the South American state of Peru, because, says he, it is not a native of Peru, but probably of Mexico, and also because the Spaniards, who must have given the word to the Portuguese, call the bird pavo, 'peacock', or pavo común, 'the common peacock', and not peru, and he adds, "for the present the origin of the bird and its name in Portuguese is an enigma". But Diogo do Couto calls the birds galinhas de Peru, 'Peru hens': "And all along that route (from Abyssinia) they had been eating many galinhas do Perú, partridges, wild cows, stags, doves, turtle doves" Decad., VII, iv, 6.

"There are many pelicans, which are as large as a big gallo do Peru" ('Peru cock'). Fr. João dos Santos, Ethiop. Or. I, p. 135.

The French coq d'Inde, the German Calecutische Hahn, the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicut), the Arabic Dajáj Hindi, the Turkish Hind Tánugu would point to an Indian origin; but the bird is not a native of India, and its name peru is an exotic. The word does not exist in Marathi and Gujarati. Hindustani has, side by side with peru, śūtra-murgh (lit. 'camel-cock, ostrich') and fil-murgh (lit. 'elephant-cock') from Persian. The Dravidian languages describe the bird by means of various compounds, some of which assign to it a foreign origin.

[The view generally accepted that the domestic fowl all over the world had been derived from a bird met with it in its wild state in India had very likely a great deal to do with assigning the turkey also to India. That the turkey was an exotic and introduced into India by the Portuguese is borne out by the description of the bird from the pen of the Emperor Jahāngīr given below.¹ The turkey, domesticated by the people of Mexico and Peru, was introduced into Europe by the Spaniards, soon after the discovery of Mexico.]

directly taken from the Tamil punnakku (Whitworth gives it as pinnakku) or the Sinh. punakku and not influenced by Portuguese dialects, though pinaca occurs much earlier than poonac in the writings of European travellers. [Pinda (Arachis hypogaea, ground-nut). Anglo-Ind. pin-dar.¹ Not in Hobson-Jobson.

The Portuguese word is an adaptation of mpinda used in Congo. The O.E.D. says that ¹ [“Sometimes they (the common people of Surat) feast with a little Fish, and that with a few Pindars is esteemed a splendid Banquet. These Pindars are sown under ground and grow there without sprouting above the surface, the Cod in which they are Inclosed is an Inch long, like that of our Pease and Beans. . . . this name for the nut was carried by negroes to America, and that the name for the ground- or pea-nut in the West Indies and Southern United States is 'pindar'. But which is the original home of this nut? De Candolle inclines to the view that it is a native of Brazil and that it was carried from there to Africa and Asia by the Portuguese. But there are serious difficulties in the way of accepting this view; the most important of which is that the dispersion of this plant over a very large part of Africa and the extensive zones in which it is and was cultivated cannot be easily accounted for by assuming that the plant was introduced into Africa after 1500. Burton (Lake Regions, II, 52) referring to a region situated on the borders of Tanganika says "U-Karanga signifies etymologically the land of ground-nuts." Now there are those who identify 'U-karanga' with the land of Mocarangas or —Ba-caranga—which as a province of the grand empire of Monomatapa was known to Fr. João dos Santos. If, therefore, the etymology suggested by

Burton is reliable, it becomes very difficult to believe that a plant introduced into Africa after 1500 should by 1580 or 1590 have given its name to a vast region in the interior of the continent.

There are equally great difficulties in assuming that the plant is a native of Africa and was therefrom introduced into America.

There are a series of names by which this plant was known to the Portuguese. Some like the following appear to be of Brazilian origin: manobi, mundubi, mendobi, mendobim, mendoim, amendoim; others clearly African in origin: mancarra in Guinea and Cape Verde Islands; mpinda on the Congo Coast; ginguba in Angola; karonga in Swahili on the east coast.

The more probable view seems to be to regard it as indigenous both to America and to Africa. See Ficalho, Plantas Uteis da Africa Portuguesa, p. 133 seq., where the question has been discussed at length. Watt, however, is of opinion that the home of the plant is Brazil.

The ground-nut is another of the long list of plants introduced into India in recent times. In India it is known by different names in different localities; some of these are perhaps evidence of successive and independent efforts to introduce it into India. "It may have come from China to Bengal (hence the name Chini-badam); from Manila to South India (Manila-kotai), and from Africa and very possibly direct from Brazil as well, to Western India." Watt, The Comm. Prod. of Ind., (1908), p. 74. In Konkani it is known as Mosmichim biknam ('Mozambique nuts') which attests to its introduction into Goa from Africa.]

[? Pingue (adj., fat). Anglo-Ind. penguin, the general name of birds of the family Spheniscidae.

Yule says that 'penguin' may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat', but this conjecture is not accepted by the O.E.D. which also rejects, after due analysis and examination, all other derivations till now put forward and maintains that the origin of the word is obscure. The Novo Dicionário derives Port. penguim from Fr. pingouin. Pyrard mentions "numbers of birds called pinguy, which lay there (in the Maldive Islands) their eggs and young, and in quantities so prodigious that one could not . . . plant one's foot without touching their eggs or young". But the editor (Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 97) says that there are no penguins at the Maldives and that the author is describing probably manchots.]

"A pires of silver, gilded over." Ibid., p. 754.

Kacha-piring, picha piring (lit. 'broken-plate'), in Sundanese, is the name of Gardenia florida.

Rigg says: "Piring, plate, big plate such as is used by Europeans. The small Chinese plates which are used by the natives are called pinggan." But Swettenham on the contrary in his English-Malay dictionary gives: Saucer, piring; Plate, pinggan. Favre gives to both words the meaning of "soucoupe ('saucer'), assiette ('plate')". Bickers mentions piring, 'plate'; and piring teh (lit. 'plate for tea'), 'saucer'. | Wilkinson gives it the meanings of 'plate, saucer'. |

The word pires appears to be originally a Malay word, adopted by the Portuguese and taken to India together with the word chá. But the termination es or is offers some difficulty, because piring ought normally to give pirim. Per-

"He (the King of Annam) sent three big trays, japanned and gilt, round, two spans high, full of many dishes; each of these trays contained many pires, forming a sort of a mound, in which there were all sorts of eatables." A. F. Cardim (1649), Batalhas, p. 80.

haps pires is the plural of pirim* and stands for pir-ins*. Its derivation from the Hindustani pirich is improbable, for it has the appearance of an exotic and is not mentioned by Shakespear in 1817.

[In the Glossario, the author says that it appears to him that the Hindust. pirich, the Beng. pirij, and the Sinh. pirissiya are adaptations of the Port. pires. The vern. terms in Hindustani, as also in Hindi, are lastari, thali. The word is not mentioned by Shakespear in 1817; on the other hand it is to be met with in almost all the Malasian languages in the form piring, 'a little plate.' From this it might be inferred that it was in Malasia that the Portuguese first received the word, and from there introduced it into India. Again, Cândido Figueiredo mentions pire as a cant term and gives it the meaning of a 'plate.' To this Dalgado says that it is not improbable that the word in this form, modified by Portuguese influence, was imported by gipsies from the Malay piring, 'small plate.'

It might be mentioned that Portuguese is the only one of all the European languages which uses pires in the sense of 'saucer,' and this in itself is proof that the word is of non-European origin. With regard to the borrowing of names for tea and everything connected with its service, see chicara.]

Dr. Heyligers, who mentions the word and assigns to it a Portuguese origin, gives it the French meaning pompe, which may stand as much for 'pomp' as for 'pump'. In the former meaning, it may be derived from Portuguese; but in the second, undoubtedly, from the Dutch pomp or the English 'pump'. brought the sweet orange into Europe from China, credit must be given to them for the cultivation and propagation of the fruit in Portugal, especially, in Cintra ; for thus only can one account for the persistence with which the name of Portugals has adhered to the fruit in question. " The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is portogallo, and nothing else ; in Greece portogalea, in Albanian protokale, among the Kurds portôghâl ; whilst even colloquial Arabic has bur-tûkân."]

Português (a Portuguese). Konk. Portuguêz ; vern. term phirangí (from the Persian).—Tet. Portugêz.

[Whitworth says that Portuguese is a term " applied in India not only to immigrants from Portugal, but also to the community of mixed Portuguese and Indian descent permanently settled in India. The latter are in western India called also Goanese." It is true that the 'Goanese' not only in western but also other parts of India are spoken of as 'Portuguese', but the implication that they are of mixed Portuguese and Indian descent is certainly not correct. The inhabitants of Goa with very few exceptions are pure Indians and have no vestige of Portuguese blood. Albuquerque's well-known policy of encouraging the Portuguese to marry women of the country has, perhaps, given currency to the belief that the Christian inhabitants of Goa who affect European ways of dress and have Portuguese names are the descendants of these marriages. This is far from the truth. The descendants of these and similar alliances during the centuries of Portuguese connection with the East are known as mestiços or half-breeds and form a social stratum distinct from that of the Christian natives who are converts from Hinduism. These latter would regard it as a very great offence to be referred to as being of mixed descent.

Some of the Christian inhabitants of Goa who emigrate to British India in search of their livelihood describe themselves as Portuguese. They do this because they believe that such a designation gives them a better social status and provides opportunities for more lucrative employment ; also because they think that Portuguese constitutional law which recognises the political and social equality of the colonials with the citizens of Portugal gives them also a right to describe themselves as Portuguese. There are others who desire to stress their own individuality and race and to demonstrate their regard for their own country and its history and call themselves Goans—not Goanese ;¹ the latter term has come to be regarded among them as containing a sneer. Others again who are alive to the confusion that results from Indians calling themselves Portuguese try to get over the difficulty by a sort of compromise and call themselves Indo-Portuguese or Goa-Portuguese. Thus in Bombay there used to exist two institutions belonging to these emigrants from Goa one of which was called the 'Gremio Português' and the other 'União Goana', whereas in Calcutta they have a review called 'The Indo-Portuguese Review' and in Karachi their principal centre of social life is known as 'The Goa-Portuguese Association.'

In their early connection with Goa the Portuguese referred to its inhabitants as Canarins, but as this term, like 'Goanese' in British India, came to be regarded as conveying an offensive connotation, they at the present time speak of the people of Goa as Goeses and not Goanos.

The Portuguese policy of intermarriages had been fruitful in a fairly large Luso-Indian population which was to be found in the principal centres of Portuguese trade in India: Calcutta, Madras, Cochin, etc. These mixed descendants were at one time proud of their Portuguese extraction and names, spoke a dialect of Portuguese, and described themselves as 'Portuguese', but during the closing decades of the last century, with the recognition of the Eurasian or Anglo-Indian community as deserving of especial consideration at the hands of the British Indian Government, the Luso-Indians were not slow to identify themselves with the Anglo-Indians with the hope of bettering their prospects. They gave up Portuguese speech, altered their Portuguese surnames, intermarried with Anglo-Indians, and, in fact, did everything that they thought necessary to draw a veil over their past history. When English factors or travellers speak of the 'Black Portuguese'¹ or Kala Firingis, they are probably referring to these Portuguese half-breeds who were found in most of the important cities in the East and, perhaps in some cases, to Indian converts to Christianity who adopted Portuguese style of dress. (See mestiço and topaz.)

Whilst on th subject it is interesting to record that the indigenous Christian inhabitants of Bombay, Salsete and Bassein, who nowadays call themselves 'East Indians' and who were referred to by the Portuguese as 'Norteiros' (see note to Sul), spoke of themselves in the sixties and seventies of the last century either as 'Portuguese' or 'Native Portuguese'¹.]

Pregoação (preaching). Mal. pregoaçaon (Haex).

Pregoar (to proclaim). Mal. pregoar, to proclaim; to preach (Haex).¹

In the Port. dialect of Ceylon pregoá is used in the meaning of 'to preach'.

Preparar (to prepare). Konk. prepārār-karuṅk; vern. term tayār karuṅk, sanzaṅk.—Tet. prepára; vern. term hálu, haloti.

Presente (subst., a present, a gift). Konk. present; vern. term sāguvát.—Mal. persén.—Tet. prezénti.

In Konkani the term is also used as an adjective.

Presidente (president). Konk. pirzent, one who celebrates a church feast. Used in the same sense also in Tamil and Malayalam.—Tet. prezidénti.

¹ "And they were soon proclaimed (se pregoaram) throughout the entirety of Goa with much festivity." Diogo do Couto, Dec. VI, v, 4.

Preso (imprisoned). Konk. prêz.—Guj. parej. In Konkani prêz karuṅk, and in Guj. parej karvum, means 'to arrest; to imprison'.

Prima (a female cousin). Konk. prim; vern. terms are bāpal-bahīn, chultī-bahīn; āyte-bahīn; mavśī-bahīn.—Mal. prima (Haex).—Gal. prima; vern. term liar.

Primo (a male cousin). Konk. prim; vern. terms bandhu or bandh; bāpal-bhāv, chultó-bhāv; āyte-bhāv; māme-bhāv; mavśī-bhāv.—Mal. primo (Haex).

Quaresma (popular form coresma, Lent). Konk. korejñ.—Beng. korjñu.—Tam. karesmai.—Tet., Gal. koresma.

Quartel (military barrack). Konk. kartel. The word is also used to signify 'contribution or tax paid every quarter'.—Tet. kartel; also signifies 'arrested, to arrest'.

Quarto (subst., quarter; apartment). Konk. kvárt, room, apartment, also used of 'the fourth part of a piece of paper', or 'the quarters of an hour'.—Tet. kuártu, apartment.

Queijo (cheese). Konk. kêj.

—Sinh. kéju.—Mal. kéju, kíju.
—Sund. kíju.—Jav., Mad.,
Mac., Bug. kéju.—Tet., Gal.

Rábão ('radish'). Sinh. rābu; vern. term mulaku.

Rabeca (a fiddle). Konk. rebek.—Mar. rabak (also rabáb).—Malayal. rabekka.—Kan. rabaku.—Tet., Gal. rabeka.

Gonçalves Viana has doubts as to the Arabic rabáb being the source of the Portuguese rabeca [Apostilas, II, p. 325]. Rabáb is adopted in Persian, Hindustani, Gujarati and also in Marathi.

The names of European musical instruments and their accessories are, in Konkani, almost all Portuguese.

Ração (ration; allowance). Konk. rāsāmv. It is especially used in connection with the allowance of liquor which is given to workmen.—L.-Hindust. resan.—Mal. ranson.—Jav. rasan, ransan. Ngransommi, to give ration. In the verbal form, the initial r is preceded by ng.—Tet., Gal. resā; vern. term sāhi.¹

It is but proper to note that Dutch has rantsoen.

[Ráia (the ray fish, popularly also called skate). Anglo-Ind. *raia*² (obs.).]

The quotation below is the only passage where we have come across the use of this form in Anglo-Indian writings.

[Ramada (a shelter made of boughs; in Portuguese India, a temporary shed erected generally for marriage festivities, the roof and sides of which are covered over with coco-nut fronds the leaflets of which are braided into mats). Tam. ramade, according to Manucci (ed. Irvine, Vol. III, p. 339): "Seven days afterwards a sort of four-cornered tent was erected, called by these people ramade".

Irvine is evidently on the wrong track when he tries to explain the word thus: "The word used might be aramanai, 'royal palace', or araimanai, 'single-room house'. Or can it have any connexion with Rām-kelā, a name for the plantain-tree? (see 'Madras Manual of Administration,' iii. 687). Plantain trees are used in erecting the pandal".]

Ramo (branch, bough). Sinh. rāmuvā, moulding, picture.—Mal. ramo (Haex).

In the Portuguese dialect of Ceylon, ramo also signifies 'a framed picture'.

It may be that in this sense ramo is a corruption of lāmīna, used in Konkani as lāmn. In Konkani ram is the name of 'the palm-leaf blessed on Palm-Sunday'. Cândido de Figueiredo says that lāmīna, in the sense of 'frame, picture', is used in Miranda, Trás-os-Montes.¹ Dutch has raam in the sense of 'a frame'.

Rancho (a group of men assembled for a journey or for marching; also the food that is served out to a company of soldiers or sailors). Konk. rānch.—Sinh. rānchuvā, class of people (Eng. 'rank'); vern. terms pēla, pēliya.

? Raso (even, level). Mal. rata.—Jav. rôtó.

Dr. Heyligers attributes the change of s into t to the law of repulsion, that is, to the pre-existing vocable rasa or rósó from the Sansk. rasa, 'taste, sentiment'.

From rôtó is formed in High Javanese radin, whence radiman, 'level plain; a street'. See passear.

Raxa (arch., 'a species of thick cloth'). Jap. rasha.¹

Razão (reason). Konk. razámv. But serezámv = sem-razão, without reason; vern. terms kārān, prastāv, pramān.—Tet., Gal. rezã.

Recado (message, compliments). Konk. rekád.—[Anglo-Ind. recado, recarders (obs.)].—

Mal. recado (Haex).—Tet., Gal. rekádu.

[Pyrard speaking of the pages that used to accompany in Goa the Portuguese lords and gentlemen says: "Their service only is to attend their masters and to carry messages, which they call Recates". Gray commenting on this term makes the following surmise: "Unless Dr. Murray and his coadjutors can give earlier authority, I venture to think we have here the original of our modern phrase "kind regards" ".¹ The earliest citation in the O.E.D. of 'regard' in the sense of 'token or evidence of esteem or affection' is dated 1747, and of 'regards' in epistolary expressions of goodwill 1775. The Dictionary lists the Anglo-Indian forms recado, recarders, etc., but does not support Gray's conjecture; it derives the English 'regard' from French.

There can be no doubt, however, that the Portuguese recado, 'a message or errand', pl. recados, 'compliments or greetings' must have acquired considerable vogue among

Recheio (stuffing, in cookery). Konk. rechey.—Mal. richá, richya, a species of capsicum; vern. terms chábi, chá-bey, lada china.

Recibo (receipt). Konk. resib; vern. term pāvti.—Guj., Hindi, Hindust., Or., Sindh., Punj. rasid.—Ass. rachita.—Malayal. rasidu, rasdi.—Tel. rasidu.—Kan. rasidi, rasidi, rasidu.—Tul. rasidi.—Anglo-Ind. rased.—Mal. resit.—Tet., Gal. resibu.—Pers. rasid.

Yule and Burnell regard rased or rasid as a corruption of the English 'receipt' through the influence of the Persian rasída, 'arrived', viz., an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand'.

Registo (a register). Konk. rejíst (also us. of a small religious picture); the vern. terms are puttī, śivdī.—Tet. rejístu.

Regra (rule, example). Konk. regr; vern. terms oḷ, regh; nem.—Tet., Gal. regra.

Rei (king). Konk. rey (king in cards). Mac., Bug., réi (king in cards).—Nic. dem. Dem-en-kína (lit. ‘wife of the king’), queen.

Man derives dem (= dē) from the Port. rei and, I believe, with reason, notwithstanding the phonetic divergency. R initial and medial can be changed into d; cf. dai = rai, ‘leaf’, kadū = karú, ‘wide, large,’ lará < Malay láda, ‘pepper’. The Nicobarese have not got the diphthong ei, and the nasalisation is explained by the tendency of their language.

[Reinol (one born in the kingdom (reino), i.e. Portugal; a term used by the Portuguese in India to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born (see castiço). Konk. reināl.—Anglo-Ind. reinol, reynolds, reynol (obs.).¹

Yule says that at a later date the word appears to have been applied to Portuguese deserters Remédio (remedy). Mal. remedio (Hæx).

Renda ('rent, hire'). Konk. rend. Rendák divuñk or tāvuñk, to let on hire or rent. Rendák ghevuñk or karuñk, to take on lease. Rendāchó, leased. Rend-kár, the lessee, he who holds on payment of rent. Rendêr has lost its original meaning of 'a person who held estate on payment of rent'; it is now used to designate a sub-caste composed of the Sudras who live on the estate of another and take up, on payment of rent, coconut trees which they tap for toddy. The vernacular terms for the Portuguese renda are: sāró, dhāró; ghên (us. in Kanara).—Mar. rend, monopoly. Rendkari, a monopolist. Rend-sarā, a distillery (us. in Rajapur and Savantvadi).—Guj. rent (perhaps from English).—Sinh. réndayu, hire; toll, customs. Rēnda-karanavā, to farm out the revenues of the State. Rēndapala, the place where the imposts are paid. Rēndakárayā, farmer of rent, tenant; farmer of toll. Atu-rëndakárayā, a sub-lessee, a partner in the farming of the revenue of the state.

[There are references to 'Rende Verde' in the Surat Letters. This was evidently the name of a tax levied by the Portuguese and derived by the Company in and around Bombay. In a letter of Aungier and others, dated 7th April, 1676, it is described as follows: "The new Rent called "Rende verde" consists of Oyle, Opium, Bange, and Mowra. Noe person except ye farmer being permitted to retaile under a maund, it will in time wee hope prove a good addition to ye Revenue, ye Merchants and all other being well satisfied therewith." (Forrest, Selections (Home Series), Vol. I, p. 92). The name shows that the tax or rent was to be levied on vegetable produce. Verde in Port. means 'green'.]

Renda ('lace'). Konk. rend; vern. terms zālī; dāl (l. us.).—Sinh. rēnda, rēndapatiya.—Tam. renda.—Ann. ren.—Mal., Sund., Day., Mac., Bug. rēnda.—Jav. rēndó (also 'gold or silver lace'). Ngrendó, to furnish with gold lace. Rinendó, decked with gold lace or finery.

[Rendeiro (in the sense of 'tax-gatherer or revenue-farmer'). Konk. rendêr (see above under renda).—Anglo-Ind. rendero, rendere (obs.).¹

It is an Indian word from the Sanskrit rūpya, 'wrought silver'. Dr. Heyligers believes that the Portuguese carried it to Insulindia. Dr. Schuchardt and Dr. Matthes attribute to sábtu or sáptu an Arabic origin; but Dr. Heyligers is inclined to favour the Portuguese derivation of the word and supports his view by citing mingo from the Port. domingo, 'Lord's day or Sunday'.

rites the Sund. sāgū from Sinh. saguna (Sansk. saguna), in the sense of 'a valuable substance', but this appears to be an arbitrary derivation. According to Yule and Burnell, the original word is the Malay sāgū; the plant is indigenous to the Indian Archipelago, and probably its original home was the region from the Moluccas to New Guinea.

It is not known for certain whether sagu was known in India before the sixteenth century; it may, therefore, be presumed that the Portuguese helped to spread the use of the word.

As there was no copper coin, as far as I know, called Santa Maria, I presume that the term denotes some place from which the Nicobarese first received the coin referred to above or one more or less like it. Perhaps it was the name of one of the islands of the Nicobar group, given by the Portuguese, which at present has ceased to exist. On the coast of Kanara, there are some small islands which go by the name of Santa Maria ; but the name of the coin could not have originated from these.¹

tion that the Malay sarásah may itself have come from the Sansk. sārasa, the zone or girdle of a woman. Saraça in the sense in which it is used by old Portuguese writers with reference to India or the Far East is identical with the article called in Anglo-Ind. sarong, in Port. sarão, from Malay sarang which is the Sansk. sāraṅga, meaning 'variegated' and also 'a garment'. See Linschoten's interesting description of 'clothes of Sarasso' (Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 91). Burnell's attempt to explain 'sarasso' as the Hind. sarasā = 'superior' is very unsatisfactory.]

Sargento (sergeant). Konk. sārjent.—Tet. sarjentu.—Gal. sarjentu, sarentu.

Sarja (serge). Konk. sárj.—Mal. serja.

The Portuguese Dictionary, Contemporaneo, derives sarja from the Latin sericus, and that of Cândido de Figueiredo from the Arabic sardje.

Satán, satanás (Satan). Konk. satánáz.—Sindh. Day. setan.—Sinh. sátan.—Gar. sat-an.—Gal. salanaz.—Jap. satán.

Saitán, used in some of the Indian languages, is from the Persian-Arabic saiṭan, and satan itself may have come directly from English. Setan in Dyak must be of Dutch origin, and this is the view of Hardeland.

Saúde (health). Konk. sāvúd, health, and also drinking to one's health. In the former meaning the vern. terms are bhaláy, bhalāyki, ārām, praṇám. Sāvúd karuṅk, to raise the toast, to drink to one's health.—Beng. sāvudí.—Sinh. sāvódiya, toast.—Tet., Gal. saúdi.

[Prof. E. M. Ezekiel, of St. Xavier's College, Bombay, informs me that it is customary in the Jewish community of Malabar at the marriage-dinner given by the bridegroom's father, for the bridegroom, before they start eating, to stand up with a glass of wine and to drink to the health of his parents in the following words: Bāvādēum ummadeūm sāvudí kebiba. 'Sāvudí kebiba' is, I believe, the Portuguese saude bebo ('I drink the health'), and testifies to the extent and intensity to which the social habits of the Portuguese had influenced the life of other communities that came into contact with them.]

The Hilsa fish I had heard compared to a herring, but to which it bore no resemblance that I could find, either in taste or size, being at least six times as large. It is reckoned unwholesome to eat in any quantity." Heber, Narrative of a Journey, etc., (1828), Vol. I, pp. 126 and 127.]

Secretário (secretary). Konk. sekretár.—Tet., Gal. sekretáriu.

Sêda (silk). Konk. séd; vern. terms rešim, rešim lugaš. Sedí (adj.), from silk, silky.—Sinh. sêda; vern. terms pāṭa-redi, paṭapitiya. Sêda paṭiya, a silk-ribbon.—? Mal., Sund. sutra.—Jav. sutró.—Mad. sotra.—Tet., Gal. seda.¹

Dr. Heyligers justifies the identity of sutra and seda by means of the change of u for e and of t for d and by the intercalation of r, either as the result of carelessness or for the sake of euphony. In Sanskrit, sūtra means 'thread'.

Seguro (safe). Konk. sugúr. Sugúr-karuñk, to save. Sugúr-zāvũnk, to be safe.—[Anglo-Ind. seguro, secure (obs.), subst., in the sense of 'passport, assurance' which the substantival form has in Portuguese.]²—

["He must receive them with great reverence, Standinge Up and makeinge a Sumbra to the Queens Windows, She all the while looketh upon us, although wee cannot See her" Bowrey, Hak. Soc., p. 307.]

the older and correcter form is sumbaia. The Novo Dicionário derives it from Arabic but does not say from which Ar. word. Morais says it is an Indian word. Sir Richard Temple (Bowrey, p. 307, n.) is of the opinion that it is the Malay sembah, and quotes the meanings of this word from Wilkinson's Dictionary: "A salutation, a respectful address; the actual act of salutation or homage consisting in raising the hands to the face." Dalgado in his Glossario admits the existence of the Malay sẽmbah in the above meanings, but points out that Wilkinson also mentions sẽmbahyang in the sense of 'worship of God, prayer, ritual' (yang = 'divinity'), and is of the opinion that the source of the Portuguese word is sẽmbahyang. He accounts for the phonetic changes thus: Portuguese did not retain the nasal termination of the Malay word just in the same way as it did not retain m in the case of the Malayalam and Tamil words from which the Portuguese jangada (q.v.) is derived. The vowel of the first syllable in sẽmbahyang oscillates between a surd or e surd, and it is, therefore, not surprising that foreigner's should represent it by o surd or by u. The change of s into z was perhaps influenced by the Portuguese verb zumbar which also means 'to bow in sign of courtesy'.

With regard to the meanings of the word, Dalgado says that, though it is true, that sēmbahyang signifies literally 'divine worship', it is not to be wondered at that it should also be used to denote 'reverential homage in general', in view of the fact that in Sanskrit and the Prakrits pūjā and namaskār are also used in a similar two-fold meaning. Even assuming that the Malays had reserved the term sēmbahyang to connote 'reverence to a divine being', it is not unnatural to expect that the Portuguese should have confounded it with sēmbah, seeing that the manner in which the homage or greeting implied by the latter term was offered appeared to them little short of adoration.

Gubernatis derives sumbaia from the Sansk. sandhyā; in doing so he follows his usual bent of referring every conceivable Indian or Malay word to Sanskrit. Sandhyā could never become sumbaia or sambaia, but it would become sanj or sanz, and these forms are met with in some of the Prakrits.

Judging from the citations in the Glossario, the earliest of which goes back to 1540, it is evident the term sumbaia had acquired a great vogue among the Portuguese chroniclers, and there can be no doubt that such of the English writers as use the word either as substantive or verb adopted it from the Portuguese.

Sumbaia in its meaning of 'obeisance' was very similar to the Chinese k'o-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head', which gave 'kow-tow' to Anglo-India and English.

Sumbaia is not in Hobson-Jobson which, however, gives "Somba, Sombay, s. A present. Malay sambah-an". May not this Malay word be the same as sēmbah, and might it not be that the 'presents' which the word implies are just those that are generally offered to a person in the East when he is treated with reverence and homage?]

¹ “It appears certain that we (the Portuguese) carried the plant and its uses to Japan”. Wenceslau de Moraes, Day-Nippon. Gonçalves Viana, however, attributes a Spanish origin to the Japanese tabako “which we certainly did not leave behind there, and which must have been introduced in much more recent times than those in which we maintained direct relations with Japan”.

“In place of wine of which, as I have said, there is none, tabaco, which we call herva santa, is used; to it have been attributed throughout all the Indies so many virtues, I cannot say whether real or imaginary, and especially to the kind that grows in this Island” (of San Domingo). Gaspar Afonso (1595), in Hist. tragico-marit., VI, p. 54.

² “The revenue from tabaco (in Chaul) is nine thousand seven hundred and three patacões (q.v.) per year.” António Bocarro (1634), Livro das plantas das fortalezas, in O Chron. de Tisuary, IV, p. 33.

to Girolamo Benzoni (1550). The use of tobacco spread in India during the reign of the Emperor Akbar (16th-17th cent.). It was introduced into India, in all probability, by the Portuguese. But the following is taken from Tit-Bits of the 22nd July, 1911. "The idea that tobacco was known in Europe only after the discovery of America is erroneous. A philologist has suggested that the Greeks and the Romans used to smoke tobacco, at least in their colonies. It is said that in the Malay Archipelago the use of cheerots and cigars dates from a period before the discovery of America."¹

1 "Among them there is one which they call the smoker's weed, and which I would call 'erva sancta' (tobacco), which they say they call (in Brazil) Betum... This plant was first brought to Portugal by Luiz de Goes." Damião de Gois, Chron. de D. Manuel, I, ch. 57.

[Prof. Alfred Haddon, F.R.S., in his Head Hunters says: "Although smoking was practised in these Islands (Papua and New Guinea) before the Whitemen came, and they grew their own tobacco, they never smoked much at a time. The native pipe is made of a piece of bamboo from about a foot to between two and three feet in length. .. They enjoy it greatly and value tobacco very highly, they usually sell

It is curious that Konkani, like the Dravidian languages, has not adopted the foreign word; in this language tobacco is referred to generically as pán, 'leaf', or oḍhchém pán, 'the leaf for smoking', and is thus distinguished from the betel-leaf, which is also called pán or, more specifically, khāvunchém pán, 'the leaf for eating'.¹ From pán is derived pānkár, 'tobacconist'.

[There can be no doubt about the home of Nicotiana Tabacum being America (De Candolle, Origine, III). The Spaniards were the first to become acquainted with this plant when, at the close of the 5th century, they visited the Antilles, and Oviedo (Hystoria de las Indias, 1535) was the first to give a clear account of it. According to him tabaco was the name in the Carib of Hayti of the Y shaped tube or pipe through which the Indians inhaled the smoke. But according almost anything they possess for the same." In Ind. Antiq., Vol. XL, p. 40.]

to Las Casas (Obras 1552), it was applied to a roll of dried leaves which was kindled at the end, and used by the Indians like a rude cigar. But Monardes, the Spanish physician, published in 1517 an account of tobacco in which he says: "This hearbe which commonly is called Tabaco is an Hearbe of much anti-quitie, and knowen amongst the Indians. . . . The proper name of it amongst the Indians is Piccielt, for the name of Tabaco is given to it of our Spaniards, by reason of an Ilande that is named Tabaco." But the island of Tobago itself, after which the herb has been said by some to have been named, received, according to some, the name from its resemblance to an Indian pipe. Whatever, therefore, be the meaning which tabaco had among the Indians, the fact which remains undisputed is that the Spaniards regarded tabaco as the name of the herb or its leaf, and in this sense it has passed from Spanish into other European languages.

The tobacco plant was brought from America to Spain for the first time in 1558 and very soon began to be cultivated in the Iberic peninsula. In 1560 Jean Nicot, the French ambassador to Portugal, sent seeds of the plant to the Queen, Catherine de Medici. At first, great medicinal and almost miraculous properties were attributed to the plant and it was known by various names, such as, herba panacea, herba santa. Tobacco was first introduced into England by Thomas Harriot in 1560, and tobacco smoking became popular there thanks to Sir Francis Drake and Sir Walter Raleigh; from England the use of tobacco for smoking spread to the Continent.

It was towards the close of the 16th century that the Portuguese introduced the plant into Africa, both on the east and west coasts. The negroes took to it with the greatest readiness, and the enormous number of tiny seeds which the plant gives out facilitated its rapid propagation and dissemination in that continent. In Central Africa the names for tobacco according to Schweinfurth (Heart of Africa) are eh-tobboo, tab, tabba; in Swahili tombako; in Ki-Galla tambo and in Lu-Chicongo tabaco and fumu, the last named being the Port. fumo, 'smoke'.

There are no references to the tobacco plant in Baber's Memoirs (1519-1525) nor in Garcia da Orta's Colloquies (1563), nor in Christoval Acosta (1578), not even in Linschoten (1589). "The first direct reference to it, in connection with India, centres around certain Portuguese missionaries at the court of the Great Mughal. Doubtless to the Portuguese is due the credit of having conveyed both the plant and the knowledge of its properties to India and China. It is said in the Dara-shikohi that they had conveyed it to the Deccan as early as 1508. Asad Beg, of date 1605 (Elliot, Hist. Ind., 1875, VI, 165-7), says of Bijapur that he found some tobacco and, "never having seen the like in India I brought some with me and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work." These he presented to the Emperor Akbar, who attempted to smoke, until he was forbidden by his physician. It would thus seem to have been known in the Deccan for nearly a century before it was carried to the rest of India.....By 1617 smoking had, in fact, become so general in India that the Emperor Jehangir forbade the practice, as also had Shah Abbas of Persia (Elliot, l.c. v., 851)." (Watt, The Comm. Prod. of Ind., p. 796.)

The cultivation of the plant must have been taken up vigorously and spread with surprising rapidity, for there are references in letters and invoices received by the East India Company from its servants in the East of as early a date as 1619 to shipments of tobacco from India. These references also enable us to know the prevailing price of tobacco in India in these early years of its cultivation.¹

Watt very truly remarks :
 " As in other parts of the world, so in India, tobacco passed through a period of persecution, but its ultimate complete distribution over India is one of the numerous examples of the avidity with which advantageous new crops or new appliances have been absorbed into the agriculture and social customs and even literature of the people of India" (op. cit., p. 796). On the other hand, it is but fair to mention that it has been maintained by some that the tobacco plant is indigenous to India and that tobacco was used there both for smoking and medicinal purposes centuries before the date commonly assigned for its introduction. Mr. Ganpat Ray, Librarian, Bengal National College, Calcutta, supported this view in The Indian Antiquary (Vols. XXV, p. 176 and XL, pp. 37-40) with many quotations: one from the poet Bāṇa to show that

A rial was calculated then at about 4s. 6d. and sold for about 5 Mamūdis. Lāri was worth about an English shilling.]

smoking after dinner was a common Indian habit; others from Susruta and Charaka describing the process of 'manufacturing a cigar' and also the 'efficacy of smoking'; and also one from the Skanda-Purāṇa (ch. 52) which is as follows :

"Smokers after death will be turned into ghosts. During the Kaliyuga, Kali himself will be incarnated as the tambāla leaf.

"On the advent of the Kaliyuga all the castes will be cast into hell on smoking tobacco. The worst type of men will fall victims to tobacco. Thus, losing their dharma, they will fall into the Mahāraurava hell..."

Mr. Ray's contention is that the Bengali term for tobacco, tāmāku, is a corruption of the Sanskrit word tāmrakūṭa—a statement which he supports by quotations from old Sanskrit works. He goes further and maintains that tāmrakūṭa is the same as tamāla of the Skanda-Purāṇa. But the tamāla plant has been identified with either Garcinia Xanthochymus, Hook., or Xanthochymus Pictorius, Roxb., or Cinnamomum Tamala, Nees (Watt, Dict. Econ. Prod., Vol. III, p. 478).

It is not enough to say, as Mr. Ray does, that because tāmrakūṭa is mentioned along with opium, gānjā, and other intoxicants, it must “therefore mean ‘tobacco’.” Why should it not be some other narcotic like opium or gānjā? It requires no great philological acumen to perceive that tabaco could give in Bengali tāmāku, as it did in Marathi, in which tamākhū exists side by side with tambākhū. Moreover, botanical evidence is completely opposed to Mr. Ray’s contention. (See Ind. Antiq., Vols. I, p. 210 and XXXVII, p. 210.)

‘Toss’ is used by Fryer and Ovington in the sense of ‘a cup’, and their editors derive it from Pers. tās, ‘a cup’. But if the Persian word was so much in use in the 17th century as to have been easily picked up by English travellers it should, without a doubt, have been adopted in colloquial Urdu or Hindi, in which, however, we do not find it. The Hindi word for ‘cup’, in common use, is pyālā or jām. Taça was used by the Portuguese for ‘a cup’, especially ‘drinking cup’, and, as their festas accompanied by drinking had acquired a notoriety in India, it is not improbable that their name for ‘cup’ enjoyed considerable currency. Crooke's hypothesis that 'trankey' may be connected with the Port. trincador is inadmissible; it is no doubt the same word as the Port. terranquim. But what is the derivation of terranquim? Dalgado's view is that terranquim is either an augmentative or diminutive of terrada (Ar. ṭar-rād), the name of a short boat and also of small boats for service in war used in the same parts, which is frequently referred to by Portuguese chroniclers. It is not impossible that the Portuguese spoke of the small terrada as terradim, just as they formed the diminutive varandim from varanda, and that terradim became subsequently transformed into terraquim perhaps through the influence of terrâqueo ('terraqueous'). See Glossario. Both terrada and terranquim are mentioned in Vieyra's Dictionary. The derivation of 'trankey' given in the O.E.D. makes all the above hypotheses valueless and shows how necessary it is to seek for the explanation of a word in the language of the people by whom, and of the region where, it is used. The O.E.D. says 'trankey or tranky' is adopted from Pers. trankeh, name in Persian Gulf for a pearl diver's net, or perhaps its adjectival derivation trānki, applied elliptically to a pearling boat, and gives as its meaning 'a small undecked vessel, used in the pearl fishery in the Persian Gulf'.

There is no reason to suppose that 'trankey' owes anything to terranquim which is the Portuguese transcription of the Persian word. For the insertion of e after t, and for the nalised termination, cf. mor-dexim.]

Topaz (a dark-skinned Christian half-breed of Portuguese descent). Anglo-Ind. topaz, topass (obs.).—Indo-Fr. topas.

This term was employed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as synonymous with mestizo to denote those who claimed to be Portuguese descendants, spoke Portuguese, affected the Portuguese style of dress, professed the Catholic faith and served ordinarily as soldiers in the army.

The origin of the word has been the subject of much discussion. At least three different derivations of the word, more or less plausible, are given: (1) The Turk.-Pers.-Hindust. topchi, 'a gunner', by profession,¹ (2) Hindust. ṭopí (Tam. toppi), 'a hat' topívālā, 'one who wears a hat'), used as a distinguishing mark, at times honourable, at others opprobrious,¹ (3) Tam. tuppási (which is not mentioned in modern dictionaries) for dubáshi = Neo-Aryan dubhāśi or dobāśi = Sanskrit dvibhāśya, 'bilingual, interpreter'; because they spoke two languages.

In spite of Yule's censorious remark ("his usual fertility of error"), I find, as also does Dr. Schuchardt, that Fra Paolino de S. Bartolomeo had good reason in regarding topaz as a corruption of dobhāśya.²

In the Tamil spoken by the people, dubhāśi or dobāśi ought normally to be changed into

² "He proposed also that it was necessary for the Church of Calicut to have a Topaz, or an interpreter from the Christians of the land, who should not only be competent to carry out this work but also be one to command respect, and able to carry on negotiations with the Samorim and his ministers regarding affairs of the Church and the Christians (1698)." O Chroni. de Tissuary, II, p. 83.

tuppási; because, as it possesses only soft intervocalic sounds, it changes the initial sounds of foreign words into its own respective hard ones, and very often converts the soft medials into twin hard ones, either by assimilation or by emphasis. Cf. tāthu = Sansk. dhātu, tivu = Sansk. dvīpa; tukkam = Sansk. duḥkham, tuttu = Neo-Aryan duḍú. Malayalam, which passes for a dialect of Tamil, has in fact tuppási or tupási in the sense of 'interpreter'.¹ And Sinhalese, which occupies a place midway between the Aryan and Dravidian languages, has tuppahiyá, in the same sense; it is certainly a corruption (tadbhāva) of the Aryan dubhāśya or an adoption of the Dravidian tuppási, with h for the intervocalic s, a common phenomenon, and with the separable suffix-yá.

The designation of topaz for the 'mestizo' was more current in the south of India,² and it

² "A native Christian sprung from a Portuguese father and Indian mother is, therefore, to be presumed that it had its origin in one of the Dravidian languages. Now, if tuppasi corresponds to dubhāśi and primarily signified an 'interpreter', it is clear that it would be applied in this acceptation to the indigenous Christians who might be acquainted with Portuguese,¹ just as well as to the descendants of the Portuguese who would speak besides Portuguese one or more of the Indian vernaculars, and as such would be frequently employed as interpreters between the Europeans and the Indians.² And in this sense the term is used by Portuguese and other writers. fest and set them forth very well without topaz, or interpreter". Lucena. "Appreciating greatly the occasion of finding himself without topaz". Id., Bk. ii, ch. 16.

Afterwards, when the word came to be used of one particular race, and there were interpreters from the other classes, some of the Dravidian languages, in order to avoid confusion, imported the term dubāśi, as tatsama, in order to designate an interpreter in general, as well as a factor or agent.¹ (See Hobson-Jobson and Schuchardt, Beiträge, etc.).

[With the object of settling the vexed question of the derivation of the word 'Topaz or Topass', Sir R. C. Temple collected in chronological order as many references to, and definitions of, the term as appear in Hobson-Jobson, the O.E.D., the Ceylon Antiquary, and his own notes from original records and

Sir R. C. Temple's view of the derivation of the word is identically the same as Dalgado's. He says that there can be little doubt "that the word is an early Portuguese corruption, through a form tôpâshî in Malayalâm (the first Indian language the Portuguese learnt) of the Indian dubhâshî (Skt. dvibhâshî) one with two languages, i.e., a half-breed servant of Europeans; thence a soldier, especially a gunner, and among sailors, a ship's servant, a lavatory or bathroom attendant, and incidentally, on occasion, an interpreter. In the form topaz, topass, the term became differentiated from dûbhâshî (in the mouths of Europeans, du-bash), a superior native interpreter, and meant always a low-class half-breed. It has no relation to tôp, a gun, or to tôpî, a hat."] deceived, for they are waited on in the hospital most carelessly by Canarese or Topasses, who frequently demand payment for even the water they require As a relief to himself the Father Administrator entertains at this hospital a Topass chaplain, who looks after the patients, so they say." Manucci, ed. Irvine, Vol. III, p. 283.]

The word topí, topí or toppi, which is found in the Gaurian and Dravidian languages, with the meaning of 'cap or hat', is traced by some philologists to the Portuguese tope or tôpo ('the top, the uppermost end'). But the Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco de Gama ('The Log Book of Vasco de Gama') mentions tupy as corresponding to the Port. barrete, 'cap', in the list of Malabar words. Indian dictionary writers connect topí with topa or top, 'big hat, helmet and (in Konkani) mitre'.

[The pomelo has no Sanskrit name. It was known to the early Dutch traders as 'Pompelmoes' (=pumpkin citron), hence some of the modern names. It reached India and Ceylon in the 17th century.

The pomelo is presumed to have been introduced into India and Ceylon from Java, hence the name batávi nebu, and it was carried to the West Indies by a Capt. Shaddock after whom it is known there. The best quality of the pomelo is the thin-skinned Bombay variety, hence the South Indian name for it of bombalinas. See Watt, The Comm. Prod. of Ind.]

Portuguese dictionary-writers, with the exception of Fr. João de Sousa, point out as the original of the Portuguese word the Greek typhōn, which normally ought to give typhão or tifão. But was the term current in Portugal? Fernão Pinto says: "We went through such a terrible southwind which the Chinese call tufão". And in another place: "The storm which the Chinese called tufão".

The same source is indicated by Diogo do Couto,¹ and corroborated by John Barrow and Giles, who derive the word from the Chinese syllables ta-fung, 'great wind', and by Dr. Hirth, who derives it from the local Formosan term t'ai and fung.

Webster (s.v. typhoon) says that the whirlwind which raises clouds of dust was called typhoon "because it was regarded as the work of Typhon or Typhos, the giant who was struck with a thunderbolt by Jupiter and buried under Mount Etna". But the meaning he gives to the word is: "a violent tornado or hurricane occurring in Chinese seas".

Yule and Burnell admit that the word was first employed in the China Sea and not in the Indian Ocean, and observe that the Portuguese tufão distinctly bance so great and fierce and causes so many storms and earthquakes. . . . " V, viii, 12. "The fly of the compass was moving as fast as do the tufões of China." Id., VIII, i, 11.

["It was accompanied by such a furious storm of rain, with lightning and hail, that those who were familiar with these coasts declared it to be a tufon, a form of storm much dreaded in those parts." Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 53.]

represents tūfān and not tái-fung, and presume that Vasco de Gama and his followers got the word tufão, as well as the word monção ('monsoon'), from Arab pilots.

Indian dictionary-writers regard Arabic as the source of the word. Shakespear derives tūfān from the verb tūf, 'to turn', "or, rather, from the Chaldaic or Syriac tāfu, from Chaldaic taf and tof, to fall, to run, to overflow"; and says it is analogous to the Greek typhōn. The authors of Hobson-Jobson identify tūfān, which occurs several times in the Koran, with typhōn or typhōn and presume that it may have come to the Arabs either as the result of maritime intercourse or through the translations of Aristotle.

Robertson Smith distinguishes between two words: the one typhōn, 'whirlwind, water-spout', connected with typhos, which he says is pure Greek; and the other tūfān, 'the deluge', which he declares to be borrowed from the Aramaic. "Tūfān, for Noah's flood is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but is derived from a true Semitic root tūf, 'to overflow'". He observes that in the sense of 'whirlwind' the word is not met with in classical Arabic, but he conjectures that this meaning was derived subsequently from the Arabic root tūf, 'to go round', or, rather, introduced from some form of typhōn, typho, or tifone. See Hobson-Jobson.

In view of this controversy, it is not certain whether the Portuguese derived the word from Arabic or from Chinese, or if they at all introduced it into India. In the Portuguese spoken in India the word Samatra (q.v.) is used, by preference, to denote 'a tempest, or storm'.

[Sir R. C. Temple appears to be inclined to accept the Ar. tūfān, Port. tufão as the original of typhoon, but he proceeds to say that "some Chinese scholars, however, ascribe a Chinese origin to the term through Cantonese tái-fung, a gale, lit., tái, great, and fung, wind. It is possible that the form and sound 'typhoon' for tūfān arose out of tái-fung".

Mundy, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. III, pt. I, p. 164, n¹.

The O.E.D. distinguishes between two different Oriental words: (1) the a forms, like Port. tufão, are referred to Ar. ṭāfa which itself is probably an adaptation of Gk. Typhon, (2) tuffoon, tyfoon represent the Chinese tai-fung. The spelling of the second has apparently been influenced by that of the earlier known Indian word, while that now current is due to association with Typhon.

Below is a description of a storm given by Pyrard which is clearly influenced by the Greek conception of Typhon.²

all sail in time, and you would suppose that the masts and yards would give way and the ship be lost. Often you see coming from afar great whirlwinds, which the sailors call dragons; if they pass over ships they break them up and send them to the bottom. When they are seen coming the sailors take naked swords and strike them one against the other, in the form of a cross, on the bows of the ship, or in the direction where they see the storm coming, and they consider that that prevents it coming upon the ship and turns it aside." Voyage, Hak. The origin of the word varanda or veranda, ‘gallery round a house or sometimes only in front’, is a subject of great controversy. Three hypotheses have been put forward.

John Beames, [Whitworth.] Littré, and many others derive it from the Sansk. varaṇḍa, from the root vr or var, ‘to cover, to surround, to enclose’. And this word is marked by Böhtlingk, Cappeller and Monier Williams as a pure dictionary-word, because it is not to be found in any Sanskrit books known till now; and in the dictionaries it has various meanings, such as: multitude, group, rash on the face, a pile of hay, bundle, purse, etc.

Benfey, Böhtlingk & Roth (Dictionary of St. Petersburg, 1855–1875), Monier Williams (1st ed., 1874), Whitney, and Apte give it the meaning of ‘verandah, gallery or portico’. And the commentator of Amarakośa (dictionary of the fifth century) quotes the authority of Hemachandra (a dictionary-maker of the twelfth century) in support of the meaning of antaravedi (“a veranda resting on columns”, Williams) he gives to it, which in itself is also a pure dictionary term.¹

Böhtlingk (Sanskrit Wörterbuch in kürzerer Fassung, 1884), Cappeller (1891), M. Williams (the edition of 1899) leave out entirely the meaning of ‘gallery’, as not justified.² And

Burnell observes that the meaning referred to above "does not belong to old Sanskrit, but is only to be found in works relatively modern", but does not cite any text.

Molesworth (Mar.) distinguishes between two varandas, one of Sanskrit origin, in the sense of 'a load of hay', and the other with the various meanings mentioned above, but does not suggest its etymology. Candy (Mar.) translates the English 'veranda' into osrí, paḍví, paḷsál, paḍ-osrí, paḍsālā, paḍávi, otí. Almost all these words, and in addition to these osró and otó, are current in Konkani. Gundert (Malayal.) admits the Portuguese source. Campbell (Tel.) adopts the Sanskrit derivation. Ziegler (Kan.) states that varanḍa is a foreign term but does not indicate its origin. Haex (Mal.) mentions baranda ('a story or balcony') as a vernacular term; but Favre attributes it to a Sanskrit and Wilkinson to a Portuguese origin. Rigg (Sund.) derives it from Portuguese.

Yule & Burnell were the first to suggest that there existed in Portuguese and Spanish the word varanda, independent of the Indian varanḍa. with the same or analogous meaning, because the author of the Roteiro (1498) employs it without explaining it,¹ and also

1 "And he came to join us where we had been put in a varanda where there was a large candlestick made of brass that gave us light." Fernão Pinto (1540) employs the word varanda very often as though it was well-known: "We entered with her into another court much nobler than the first, surrounded on all sides with two kinds of varandas, as if it had been a cloister of monks." [Cogan renders this reference to verandas thus: "all about invironed with Galleries" (in Hobson-Jobson).] And Gaspar Correia (1561): "The King was in a varanda, so that he saw everything in the order in which it happened."

[In Chronica de Bisnaga (1525), ed. David Lopes, both forms varandas and barandas are met with and nowhere is an explanation of the term offered: "The palaces of the King (of Vijayanagar) are of this kind: they have a gate leading to an open space ... and above this gate there is a pinnacle very high built like such others with their varamḍas. . . . After going through this gate you find there is a large open space ... and you soon come to another gate very like the first ... so much so that when you have entered this you have a large open space before you, and on either side of it some low baramḍas in which the captains and because it occurs in Vocabulista Árábigo of Pedro de Alcalá (1505). And the following passage, very significant, can also be cited from João de Barros in proof thereof: "The inhabitants of Ruçotello made an open wooden gallery which in those parts serves the same purpose that varandas or terraces do among us." Dec. III, v, 7.

Gonçalves Viana (Ortografia Nacional, Apostilas aos Dic. Port.) defends this hypothesis with many arguments of great value; he connects the word with vara ('a rod') and varão ('a bar'), and concludes that "the existence of this word in India and in the Romanic languages is accidental, as the same must be the case with that of tanque ('tank') and of chapa ('mark') in Portuguese and the Indian vernaculars".

Even if the existence of varāṇḍa in Sanskrit and its transmission into many present day Prakrits were not open to dispute, it appears to me, for more than one reason, that the meaning of 'a gallery with columnus', which is to be found in some of these languages, is not Indian, but derived from Portuguese, and has found its way into them in modern times. First, no Sanskrit or Prakrit passage with varanda in such a sense is found before the sixteenth century. Secondly, Konkani, Hindustani, Oriya, Sindhi, Kashmiri, to judge from the dictionaries of these languages, are not at all acquainted with the word in the form varāṇḍa. Thirdly, many dictionaries of the other languages do not mention it, as for instance the Gujarati Dictionary of L. Patel and N. Patel, the Sinhalese of Clough, the Punjabi of Starkey; or they derive it from another language, as the dictionary of Singh does, from the Persian barāmada; or they make a phonetic distinction between barāṇḍā or barāṇḍa and varāṇḍā, as does the Hindi Dictionary of Guni Lala, the Sinhalese of Carter (s.v. portico). Fourthly, Marathi and Assamese do not assign to the word varāṇḍā the meaning of 'a gallery or portico'. Fifthly, in Konkani varāṇḍ has no cerebral sounds, and is employed solely among the Christians together with other terms (vasró, vasrí) and in a meaning which is peculiar to it. Sixthly, the English form veranda or ver-andah betrays clearly its Portuguese, and not indigenous, origin; had it been the latter, it would have become varand.¹

The third hypothesis, little probable, proposed by Webster and C. Defréméry, points out as the primary source of varanda the Persian barāmada (introduced into Hindustani), a compound of bar ('from above') and āmada ('coming'), and equivalent to 'coming forward, projecting'. Yule thinks it possible that it may be a Persian 'striving after meaning' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed.

[The O.E.D. says that 'ver-andah' was originally introduced into English from India, where the word is found in several of the native languages as Hindi varandā, Beng. bārāndā, mod. Sansk. baranda, but it appears to be merely an adoption of Port. and older Sp. varanda (baranda), railing, balustrade, balcony. The Fr. véranda appears to it to have been adopted from English, but to Dalgado from Indo-Fr. through Portuguese.]

Low Lat. verrinum or perhaps better verrina: "cum verrinis perforavit" ('bored holes with a gimlet') Ducange, from Lat. verruína and this again from veru, from which source we have also the Low Lat. ver-rubius (terebrus). In consequence the Spanish word ber-rima is neither of Germanic nor Arabic origin, as some have imagined. The Arabs received it from the people of Spain as M. Dozy with much reason conjectured, and from it formed the word berren."

All the same, it is very probable that barmá or barmó in

Muzaffer Shah of Gujarat included a rhinoceros among the presents he sent in 1513 to Afonso de Albuquerque—not to the King of Portugal, as is wrongly mentioned by Barbosa (see cit. p. 1). Albuquerque decided to send this strange and rare creature to King Manuel I who took a keen interest in oriental curiosities. The rhinoceros reached Lisbon safely and was kept in the royal menagerie till 1517. In that year the King was seized with the extraordinary whim to see a fight between the rhinoceros and an elephant which he also happened to own. In February of that year the two beasts were made to confront each other in a large enclosure. The rhinoceros rushed to attack the elephant, but the latter to everybody's surprise jumped over the railing of the enclosure and with loud trumpeting ran for safety to his stall, leaving the rhinoceros master of the field. Shortly afterwards the King sent the victorious beast as a present to the then Pope, Leo X. The vessel carrying the animal left Portugal in October, 1517. It put in at Marseilles and Francis I, who happened to be just then at this port, had an opportunity of seeing this strange pachyderm. When the ship continued the voyage to its destination, it was caught in a storm and sank near the coast of Italy. The rhinoceros perished but its carcass was washed up on to the shore; it was skinned and stuffed and carried to the Pope. This is the brief and tragic but remarkable history of the first and, perhaps, the only rhinoceros that found its way from Gujarat to Europe. See Correia, Lendas, II, 373. Damião de Góis, Chronica, etc., pp. 276 and 277; Ficalho, Coloquios, I, pp. 320 and 321.

¹ The new vocables, citations, and information set down herein came to my notice too late to be inserted in the body of the book.—Ed. and Trans.

1628-37.—“On the tops of these interlaced trees we saw large numbers of monkeys and below some abadas or rhinoceroses, which frequent those wilds.” Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 124.

Abafado (a dish of stew, see p. 2). Anglo-Ind. buffath.

For recipes for preparing “Madras Buffath, Buffath of Fresh Meat, Mutton Buffath”, see Indian Cookery by Anglo-Indian, pp. 75 and 76.

Achar (pickles, see p. 6).

The citation below from Fryer helps to explain why Goa was noted for mango pickles.

1672-1681.—“They [the Goa women] sing, and play on the Lute, make Confections, pickle Achars, (the best Mongo Achars coming from them). Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 28.

1640-41.—“After numerous dishes of various kinds of flesh, both of domesticated and wild animals and birds, with stimulants of sundry achares, made of cucumber, radish, limes, and green chillies, soaked in strong fragrant vinegars, that served to spur the appetite.” Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 127.

Adarga (a buckler made of buffalo hide). Anglo-Ind. adarga (obs.). Neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1638.—“Every Cavallero was bravely appparelled with an adarga, which is a great pastboard or leather buckler on his arme.” Mundy, Travels, Vol. III. pt. i, p. 266.

Aduana (customs-house). Anglo-Ind. aduan (obs.). Neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1610.—“To-morrow we purpose to send you the copy hereof by the old scrivano [q.v. p. 149] of the Aduano of . . .” Danvers, Letters, Vol. I (1602-1613), p. 51.

Afogado (a kind of stew). Konk. fugād; arros fugād, rice boiled in broth.—Anglo-Ind. foogath.

“Foogaths are vegetables fried with onions and the usual mussala” (condiments). Indian Cookery, p. 94. There are recipes for various kinds of ‘foogaths’ in the book.

Águila, Áquila (aromatic wood, see p. 8).

Below is a very early Anglo-Indian form of this word which clearly discloses its connexion with the Portuguese vocable.

1619.—“As to the sale of the prize goods left at Jask, ‘especially of that called by the name of Aglia, which we understand to bee lignum aloes, and was a fitt commodity for England.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1618-1621), p. 141.

Alcatraz (Diomedea exulans, L., see p. 11).

The following two quotations are not in Hobson-Jobson. The second is interesting because it introduces us to a new form of ‘albatross’ not in the O.E.D.

1638.—“Allcatrazes is againe the biggest of any Seaffowle I have yett seene, spreading Near 6 or 7 Foote with his wings, which hee seemeth not to Move att all as hee Flyeth leisurely and close to the Rymme off the water.” Mundy, Travels, Vol. III, pt. ii, p. 360.

1690.—“The Sailers have commonly notice of this Land before they Espy it, by the Soundings which run out sixty Leagues into the Ocean, and the Almitrosses which is a large Sea-Fowl, and never fly very far from Land.” Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 279.

Aldeia (a village, see p. 12).

The earliest reference for this word in the O.E.D. is of 1698.

1609.—See quotation under Alfandega infra.

1619.—“The indigo was bought ‘in the aldeas’ at 24 and 25 rupees per maund.” Foster, Eng. Fact (1618-1621), p. 86.

1673.—“On both sides [of the Bagein River] are placed stately Aldeas, and Dwellings of the Portugal Fidalgos.” Fryer, East India, Vol. I, p. 308.

Alfandega (customs-house, see p. 12).

This word which is met with frequently in the English Factory and travellers’ reports assumes in Anglo-India various forms: alfandica, alfandia, alfandira, and alfandiga. It is not in the O.E.D.

1609.—“If you shall think it very indiscreetly done by me to trust him, I would have your Worship to take notice that . he bought of the Malabars for 30 or 40,000 pound sterling and paid all with content in a very royal manner, moreover he renting part of the Alphandia for 100,000 m. per year and Aldeas in the country for 110,000 m. per year.” Danvers, Letters, Vol. I, p. 25. In a postscript to the same letter (p. 28) we read “Taspitas as yett holdeh both the Alphandica and his Aldeas”.

1609.—“Neare to the castle [of Surat] is the alphandica where is a paire of staires for lea ting and unleading of goods” William Finch, in Foster, Early Travels, O.U.P., p. 134. On p. 128 of the same book, Finch spells the same word Alphandira.

1615.—“This place [the quay in Goa] is always crowded with ships and vast numbers of people. It contains a very handsome building, resembling the Place Royale at Paris in style, but not otherwise: it is called ‘Alfandequa, and there they store and sell in gross all kinds of grain, which may not be sold or taken elsewhere. The customs dues are paid here” Pyrard, Voyage, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 48.

“All grains, seed and other food-stuffs that come from abroad are discharged into the Alfandegue, and are there sold and distributed to those that want them.” Idem, p. 177.

1615.—“For my prouisions he would see them at the Alfandica, and what was for the king should passe, what for other vses should paye and passe.” Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 71; see also pp. 68 and 72.

1616.—“That the goods of the English may be freely landed, and, after despatch in the Alfandiga...” Foster, Letters, Vol. IV, p. 79.

1616.—“Also a present determined to be given the Judge of the Alfandica, the particulars, viz.:

2 vests cloth; 1 damask piece; 2 sword-blades; 6 knives; 1 bottlestrong water; 1 perspective glass; 1 dozen spectacles; 6 gorgolets [see p. 170]; 6 wine glasses; 12 plates; 6 gilded dishes; 1 looking glass gilded.” Ibidem, p. 198.

The last citation is instructive inasmuch as it throws very interesting light on the customs-officials in India in the 17th century.

Almadia (a small boat or canoe, see p. 13). Anglo-Ind. almadee. The earliest instance of this word—not this form—in the O.E.D., from English sources, is of 1681.

1630.—“Hari Vaisya also told them that among the Portuguese prisoners in the hands of the English is one ‘of especiall noate and quality’, for whose escape a plan has been arranged with ‘some Parseis or Muccadams there about Swally’, the idea being to get him away (with the connivance of certain Englishmen) in one of the boats of the fleet or ‘a small almadee of the Portingalls’.” Foster, Eng Fact. (1630–1633), p. 101.

Almude (a Portuguese measure for wine or oil; “twenty-six almudes make a pipe” Vieyra). Anglo-Ind. almode, almoodae (obs.). Neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1644.—“22 almodes of oil.” Foster, Eng Fact. (1642–1645), p. 217.

1673.—“1 Barrel is six Almbodaes.” Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 130.

Alviçaras (a reward given for good news). Konk. alvis.—Anglo-Ind. albricias (obs.).

The word in the citation below may also be the Spanish albricias.

1638.—“In this 20 Daies space wee had variable News of our Merchantts att Cantan, sometymes thatt they would bee here within a Day or two, other tymes thatt itt would bee long ere they could come. Once [at Macao] the Jesuitts Man came running, calling for Albricias (which is a terme thatt signifies a gratification for good newes), which was given him.” Mundy, Travels, Vol. III, pt. I, p. 270.

Ananás (pine-apple, see p. 16).

The following quotations are of interest inasmuch as they show what value was set on this fruit in the early seventeenth century.

1615.—“Soe [the Governor of Surat] giuing me two Pines, with a long speech of the dayntenes, which I bade a seruante take, telling him I knew the fruit vearly well, I took my leave.” Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 68.

1616–19.—“Their fruits are very answerable to the rest; the countrey [of the ‘Great Mogol’] full of muskmelons, water-melons, pomegranats, pomecitrons, limons, oranges, dates, figs, grapes, plantans (a long round yellow fruit, in taste like to a Norwich peare), mangoes (in shape and colour like to our apriocks, but more luscious), and to conclude with the best of all, the ananas or pines which seemes to the taster to be a pleasing compound made of strawberries, claret-wine, rose water, and sugar, well tempered together." Edward Terry, in Foster, Early Travels, O.U.P., p. 297.

Apa (flat cake, see p. 22).

The quotation below is of interest inasmuch as it gives the names for the different varieties of these cakes in the Punjab, and describes the way they were prepared.

1640-41.—"Bread was not lacking in these bazārs [of 'Laor'] or markets, although always made in flat cakes. It was of three different kinds with three separate names, Apas, Curuchas, and Ragunis. The first, which form the usual bread of the ordinary and poor people, are entirely of flour, baked on iron plates or clay dishes which are put upon live embers; it remains, thus cooked, unleavened bread: this kind of bread is generally eaten by those who travel by caravan in these parts. The second kind of bread, Curuchas, is a white, good bread used by the richer and more refined classes; the third the Ragunis, is a very fine bread, delicate in flavour and made from wheat flour and the purest ghi, so as to come out in thin leaves." Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, pp. 187 and 188.

Araca (distilled country spirit, see p. 23).

1617.—"The 5th of July the Speedwell arrived, whereof was Master John Cleare, by whom I received your kind letter with two hogshead of rack accordingly, for which I thank you." Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 22.

To judge from the quotations below, 'Goa arrack' in the 17th century must have been highly prized. See also quotation under Nipa on p. 241. It was then sent out to England, and at the present day not only is 'Goa arrack' contraband in British India, but India itself is practically inundated with foreign spirits and liquors.

1698.—"Augt. 1. Bought a half a hogshead of Goa Arrack to send to England to Mrs. Mounk." Entry by John Scattergood in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIX, Suppl., p. 33.

"By drawing off tody or juice, a vast quantity of arrack may be made, which in time may beat out the trade of Batavia and Goa rack, or at least we may share with them" Idem, Vol. LX, Suppl., p. 104.

Armada (a fleet of war vessels, see p. 24). Anglo-Ind. armado (obs.).

1642.—"Including 4,000 xerafins repaid for a similar sum advanced by Cogan at the Viceroy's request 'to the Capt. Mor of the armado sent to St. Tomees succour.'" Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 60.

1651.—See under Terranquim in Supplement.

1673.—“The Portugals striving to possess themselves of Muschat, were put to such stress, that had not their Armado come to their relief, they must have desisted their Enterprize.” Fryer, East India, Vol. I, p. 193.

Arrasador (one who ruins or destroys). ? Anglo-Ind. ransadoes (obs.).

“The second evening came before our hellhound Governour, who stooping against all our and our friends reasons sayd wee were ransadoes and one with the [Dutch?] and comanded the Cottwall to keepe us saufe till nixt, morninge.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1622-1623), p. 73.

Arrendador (revenue-farmer; see also Rendeiro, p. 310). ? Anglo-Ind. rendedare (obs.).

1632.—“Our sute to this King (advised you in our last) mett with opposition by Mirza Rosvan, rendedare of this place, and chancellour of this kingdome.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 22.

Ata (custard-apple, see p. 26).

The quotation below is, according to Sir Richard Temple, the earliest notice of this fruit by European writers.

1636.—[At Goa] “A Delicate Fruit resembling a pine, butt when ripe it is offt and of an Admirable tast, called Atae.” Mundy, Vol. III, pt. I, p. 58.

Atambor (a drum). Konk.

tambor.—Malayal tampêre (a kind of drum).

See Ind. Antiq., Vol. LVII, Nov., 1928.

Bacamarte (a blunderbuss; a gun with a bell mouth). Anglo-Ind. boca-mortis, boca-mortass, bukmar (obs.).

Sir Richard Temple (Ind. Antiq., Vol. I, p. 227) offers an ingenious derivation of the Portuguese word, viz., Port. boca, ‘mouth’, and mortis, ‘death’, hence ‘death-dealing mouth’. Death in Port. is morte and not mortis. Longworth Dames’s conjecture is that the word might conceivably stand for boca-Martis, and thus mean ‘the mouth of Mars’, instead of ‘the mouth of Death’. This word must not be confounded with the Port. bracamarte which means a broadsword or cutlass. The Portuguese dictionaries derive this latter from the French, through Low-Latin, braquemart, ‘cutlass’, but offer no derivation of bacamarte. The Anglo-Indian forms are neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

“They kept at a small distance firing their muskets and bocamortasses and flying granadoes.” Ind. Antiq., Vol. XLIX, p. 10. See also idem, Vol. I., p. 227.

"They [the Portuguese in Goa] live with a splendid Outside, vaunting in their number of Slaves, walking under a Street of their own Umbrelloes, baro-headed, to avoid giving Distaste in not removing their Hats: They being jealous of their Honour, pardon no Affront; wherefore to ogle a Lady in a Balcony (if a Person of Quality) it is revenged with a Bocca Mortis, or to pass by a Fidalgo without due Reverence, is severely chastised." Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 26.

Bandel (a landing place, a harbour; also used to denote a quarter near the harbour occupied by people of one race.) ? Anglo-Ind. bunder, banda (obs.).

The Portuguese form is a corruption of the Pers. bandar 'port, wharf' which has been adopted by most of the Indian languages.

Bandel was used by the Portuguese as early as 1529 and it is not unlikely that the Anglo-Indian forms are indebted to Portuguese.

In the great emporiums of the East there were separate localities in which the members of the various trading communities lived, and at the head of each of these was its respective 'shabunder,' who would correspond to the consul of the present time and with whom foreign traders and ship-masters would transact. Each of such localities was spoken of by the Portuguese as a bandel; thus they speak of bandel dos guzarates, bandel dos quelins, bandel dos Portugueses.

The term was also used of smaller ports in which there were no distinct trading communities: bandel de Chatigão, bandel de Ugolim (situated on the right bank of the Hugli). This last named place appropriated to itself the name 'Bandel' by which it is known to this day. There was in it already in the 16th century a Portuguese factory and a large Portuguese population which built the first Catholic church in Bengal. This settlement and the Portuguese in it went through many vicissitudes but the old name of the place as also its sumptuous church edifice and the adjoining Augustinian monastery have survived them all, and the last two even yet continue to attract the reverent admiration of the people of the surrounding country. See Dalgado's Glossário, s.v.

1616.—“ Besides the danger in intercepting our boats to and from the shore, etc., their firing from the Banda, would be with much difficulty.” Foster, Letters, Vol. IV, p. 328.

1673.—“ We fortify our Houses have Bunders or Docks for our vessels, to which belong Yards for Seamen, Soldiers, and Stores.” Fryer, East India, Vol. I, p. 289.

Banean (a Gujarati trader, see p. 38).

To the compounds of this word mentioned on p. 39 two others might be added: Banyan-day and Banyan-fight. They appear to have acquired a currency as early as the seventeenth century.

The first of the following quotations is of special interest because it recalls to mind the not unsimilar efforts made by Governments and trading houses in India to combat the trade and financial depression at the present day.

The expression ‘banian-fight’ is not in the O.E.D. The earliest reference in it for ‘banian-hospital’ is of 1813, but though the name is not used the hospital itself is described by Fitch (c. 1585). See R. Fitch in Foster. Early Travels, pp. 14 and 25.

1634.—“ As rigid economy is necessary ‘in these sad deplorable tymes, whenas India affoordeth little or nothing whereon to begett a profitable trade for the Honourable Company’, the commanders are charged to be as frugal as possible in regard to harbour provisions They are to deliver lists of their men and the number of their messes, ‘and accordingly a computed proportion of what they may spend in such diett for Banyan daies (so called) as this place affords and the Company allowes, with promise that for the other daies care shalbe taken at Suratt that fresh meat be provided conveniently sufficient.’” Foster, Eng. Fact (1634-1636), p. 38.

1690.—“ Of this [Kedgerie or Kitcherie] the European Sailers feed in those parts once or twice a Week, and are forc’d at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them.” Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 183.

1666.—“ The men are great clowns... they make a great noise when they have any quarrel, but what passion soever they seem to be in, and what bitter words so ever they utter, they never come to blows.” Thevenot, Travels into the Levant, pt. III, p. 51 (Eng. tr. of 1687).

1690.—“ Next to the Moors the Banians are the most noted Inhabitants of Suratt who are Merchants all by Profession, and very numerous in all parts of India. They are most innocent and obsequious, humble and patient to a Miracle; sometimes they are heated into harsh Expressions to one another, which is seldom; and this Tongue-Tempest is term'd there a Banian Fight, for it never rises to Blows or Blood-shed." Ovington, O.U.P., p. 163.

On p. 39, referring to pinjrâ-pole which is the Gujarati equivalent of the Anglo-Indian 'banian-hospital,' we quoted Crooke who derived the Indian word from pinjra, 'a cage,' and pola, 'the sacred bull released in the name of Śiva.' Prof. Hodivala (Ind. Antiq. LVIII) has questioned this etymology and, it appears to us, rightly so. His view is that "Pole in Pinjrâpole means 'a block of houses often with a gateway', like the Poles or Pols of Ahmedabad." He says that 'Pola' the sacred bull released in the name of Śiva, can have nothing to do with the Gujarati word, as it is a Dravidian word. 'The 'sacred bull,' besides, is never caged. Indeed the religious merit consists in giving him his liberty.

Bangaçal (a warehouse, customs-house). Anglo-Ind. bankshall. Also used in the sense of 'a covered platform at the customs-house', and of 'port-dues.' These two usages are not mentioned in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

The derivation of the word most favoured is that from the Sansk. bhaṇḍasāla, Kanar. bhaṇḍasāle, Malayal. poṇḍisāla, 'a storehouse'. In Marathi bhaṅsāl means 'a dreary big house', but Molesworth does not give its etymology. In Goa, at the present day, the use of the word is restricted to 'a timber yard', though figuratively it is also used of 'a big and badly-planned house'.

1614.—"Order was sent to prohibit us [at Musulpatam] the King's beam, and that our goods yet to land should be detained at the Bankshall (as they call their Custom house)." Foster, Letters (1613-1615), p. 84.

1629.—"This foresaid instrument . . . was delivered to the Governour of Mesulapatam then being, and . . . read upon the banksale and in presents of the cheefe of the Moores." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1624-1629), p. 318.

1673.—"The agreement therefore is on these terms: that any goods whatsoever or horses that are his owne . . . the charges and customes, as Jaggand. . . . Banksoll, and all other dues. . . . the King does gratically give them free." Idem, (1634-1636), p. 17.

"Sends him a 'barrecoe' of beer and desires a supply of provisions." Foster, Eng. Fact (1622-1623), p. 138.

Barricada (a barrier). Anglo-Ind. barracodo (obs.).

"The enemy's vessels were 'extraordinary great ships.... The rear-admiral was the largest of all, and had been 'built upon a carack at Cochin . . . only for to make a battery and to be a barracodo to the rest of her fleet." Eng. Fact. (1621-1629), p. 49.

Bata (subsistence allowance, see p. 41).

The citation below gives proof of a much earlier use of this word in Anglo-India than do those in Hobson-Jobson.

Batão (difference in exchange, see p. 43).

In the citations below are Anglo-Indian forms not mentioned in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.; they are also of an earlier date than those mentioned there.

1634—"Thus much of your silver was sould for new rupees, to be paid daily out of the mynt as it could be coyned; whereout we had hoped to have coyned some advantage, in gayning the exchange betwixt them and mamoths here called buttaw." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1634-1636), p. 68. See also Vol. of 1637-1641, p. 100.

1651.—"When he asked Davidge he did not demand 'the vattaw of cuz-zana [khazāna=treasury] rupees due to the Company from Mr. Knipe, he with stern looks and high words told me I was a savvy knave to demaund of him about the Companies accompts" Foster, Idem, (1651-1654), p. 81.

The Marathi form of the Hindust. battau is vātāv, but it is scarcely likely that the Marathi form is used above; it appears to be a normal case of the exchange of v for b and vice versa.

Batel (a small boat, see p. 45).

With regard to this word it is useful to note what Professor Hodivalla says in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LX, p. 88.

"Whatever the source of the Portuguese 'Batell', it is certain that the Bombay 'Batelo' or the Bengal 'Patello' is not directly derived from it as the form batta occurs in the Tārīkh-i-Firūzshāhī of Baranī, which was completed in 1385 A.C. (Bibl. Indica Text, p. 490, l. 7)."

Portuguese dictionaries derive batel from the Lat. batellum. Dalgado does not include batel in his Glossário in

Bétele (betel, see p. 50).

The quotation below is of interest because of the form coined from betel to denote a carrier or box for betel-leaf, called in Hindust. pāndān. It is formed on the analogy of aguaileiro (from agua, water), a water jug, aguilheiro (from agulha, needle), a container for needles.

1628-37.—“Betel was then brought in, in a magnificent golden Betelero.” Manrique, Travels, Vol. I, p. 156.

Biombo (a moveable screen). Anglo-Ind. beeombu.

Did the Portuguese who had derived their word from the Japanese byobu or biōbu give it to Anglo-India or did English traders take it directly from Japanese? The form biombo appears to be due to the Portuguese tendency of nasalising borrowed words (cf. palanquim, from pālki) and the Anglo-Ind. beeombu appears, therefore, to be indebted to Portuguese. The form bube in the second quotation is probably due to direct contact with Japan. Neither of the two forms are in the O.E.D.

1638.—“Beeombos are certaine skreenes of 8 or 9 Foote Deepe, made into sundry leaves which principally serve to Divide a roome or to sequester some part thereof, as allsoe for Ornament, placing them against the walles.” Mundy, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. III, pt. i, p. 255.

1616.—[Here in Japan] “is also most excellent work in varnish, both chests, contors, boxes, bubes and other matters; but they will take up much room in shipping; it may be, more than they are worth.” Foster, Letters, Vol. IV, p. 53.

Bispo (bishop). Malayal. bispe.

“It is found in old Malayalam writings of the Portuguese period, and is sometimes even now used by the Roman Catholics in Malabar.” Ind. Antiq., Vol. LVI, p. 85 n.

Boi (a palanquin bearer, see p. 52).

The quotation below is of interest inasmuch as it gives evidence of how efforts were made by European travellers, without knowledge of Indian tongues, to explain Indian terms by reference to European languages. Refer to derivation of ‘Banyan’ from Italian bagnàre on p. 38.

1628-37.—“These men, who bear the palanquin on their shoulders are, as it were, the bullocks (bueyes) for such vehicles, and not only are they so in fact but even are so in name, as they are called bueyes throughout India.' Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 57.

Bolsa (purse, bag, see p. 54). Anglo-Ind. bulse (obs.).

The term was used to indicate a packet of diamonds or gold dust.

1711.—"Received a bulse, said to be of gold, of Manuel Tavoch of Macao, merchant, sealed as above, which I promise to deliver to Mr. Frederick, the dangers of the sea excepted. J. Scattergood." The Scattergoods and the East India Co., in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LX, Supp. p. 77.

Botica (a shop, see p. 57).

1668.—"Rent of the botica. x 16.0.0." Yearley Rent Rowle of Bombaim, etc. in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIV, p. 1.

Braça (a measure of extent, see p. 57). Anglo-Ind. barsa (obs.).

1638.—"Good drincking cuppes att 1*d.* and 1½*d.*, and Fruitt Dishes att 2½*d.*, each; the rest according to that rate. For a whole barsa, which is 2 tubbes, will cost 28 or 30 Ryall eight, and they usually contain aboutt 600 peeces little and great." Mundy, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. III, pt. i, p. 305.

'Barsa' in the passage above means a fathom, i.e., a six-foot

Breda do mar (lit 'sea-beet', an edible seaweed). Anglo-Ind. breda de Marr (obs.). See Scattergood's List of goods procurable at Malucca in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LVI, Supplement p. 76.

Brinco (curios, bric-à-brac). Anglo-Ind. brinquo (obs.). Not in the O.E.D.

"Thomas Kerridge at Surat to John Bangham at Lahore, April, 26, 1626, Sends a copy of his last, and again, urges the sale of his goods, 'least Manoell de Payva his brinquos cause yours to be disesteemed and this your cautious wayting produce my further prejudice'." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1624-1629), p. 130.

Búfalo (buffalo, see p. 58).

Below are some citations with Anglo-Indian forms of this word not mentioned in Hobson-Jobson. They help to show the tentative forms through which this word passed before the present day spelling became stabilised. One of them from Fryer contains a description of the buffalo which it would be hard to beat for accuracy.

1673.—"We passed Five Mile to the Foot of the Hill on which the City [of 'Canorein'] stands, and had passed half a Mile through a thick Wood, peopled by Apes, Tygers, wild Buffolo's, and Jackalls." Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 186.

1673.—"The Moors have it [water] brought on Buffola's Backs, or else on Oxen." Ibidem, p. 295.

"A Buffola is of a Dun Colour, and are all as big as their largest Oxen; they love to wallow in the Mire like an Hog; there are of them Wild, which are very Fierce and Mischievous, Trampling a Man to Death, or Moiling him to Pieces with their Foreheads; their Horns are carelessly turned with Knobs around, being usually so ordered, or rather disordered (for they retain no certain Form) that they lie too much over their Heads to do any harm with them. Their Flesh is reckon'd Hotter and Courser than Beef, which is the most common Sustenance of the Moors; as their Milk and boiled Butter is of the Gentues: for did they not boil their Butter, it would be Rank, but after it has passed the Fire, they keep it in Duppers the year round." Ibidem, p. 296.

1689.—"The Buffolo is generally larger than an Ox, but a very sower untractable Animal, by which means he is useless to the Natives in the convenience of Riding, of Hackeries, and is generally employ'd in carrying large Bags of Fresh Water on each side, from the Tanques to the Houses." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P. (1929), p. 151.

Cafre (a negro, see p. 64). Anglo-Ind. Caffro, Cofferie, Coffer.

The Portuguese used the term also to denote an African slave and in the citations below it will be seen how this meaning of the term was adopted in Anglo-India. The form 'caffro' is not in the O.E.D. where—in the earliest reference for the word in the meaning of 'slave' is of 1781.

1614.—"Signor Damian is here looking out for a caffro which is run from his master." Foster, Letters, Vol. II, p. 227.

1644.—"Send also two slaves; 'the man, being a lustie slave coffer'." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642–1645), p. 81.

"East African Negroes and slaves from Madagascar, locally known as 'Cofferies' were a well-known element of the population (of Bombay) during the early British period and continued to be imported until the middle of the nineteenth century." S. M. Edwards, Population of the City of Bombay, in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LV, p. 215.

Cairo (fibre of the coco-nut husk, see p. 64). Anglo-Ind. cairo (obs.).

There is no reference from any English traveller for this form in Hobson-Jobson. The quotation below lends support to Yule's view that the form 'coir' appears to have been introduced in the 18th century.

1583–91.—"I went from Basora to Ormus downe the Gulfe of Persia in a certain shippe made of boordes and sowed together with cayro, which is threede made of the huske of cocoos, and certaine canes or strawe leaves sowed upon the seames of the bordes."

Ralph Fitch, in Foster, Early Travels, O.U.P., p. 11.

1644.—“She [the Seahorse] is then to proceed to Goa to. . . . buy some cairo.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-45), p. 167.

Caju (the cashew tree and fruit, see p. 65).

The quotations below reveal some very strange forms of this word in Anglo-India. The form cadju though, as we have observed (p. 66), only recently noticed in India was used by Rumphius who died in 1693. The first of the following citations is of special interest because of the reference in it to Cromwell and his wife. The O.E.D. does not contain the forms ‘cadjew’ and ‘cajoora’, and the earliest instance it has of the word is of 1703.

1655.—“Concerning ‘Generall Cromwell’ he [Capt. James Martin] declared ‘that before these warrs begunn hee was a pore cowardly fellow and would take a cuff on the eare from any man’; while as for Cromwell’s wife, ‘the stone or excrecence of a fruite called a cadjew would fitt her very well for a tooth’.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 123.

1638.—“Cajooraes : of a straunge propertye. Cajooras trees, whose blossom casteth a Most Fragrant smell into the ayre, the Fruit somwhatt harsh in tast and strong. . . .” Mundy, Travels, Vol. III, pt. i, p. 57. There is evident confusion in Mundy’s mind between caju and khajūrā or khajūrī, the Indian name of the date-palm.

“Cadju is not properly speaking an Eastern fruit; but at one time it was brought there from the West Indies.” Rumphius, Herbarium Amboinense, I, p. 177. He also mentions that in Amboyna the fruit, was called boa franqi, that is ‘fruit from Portugal’.

Anglo-Ind. caminha (obs.).

1632.—“The Dutchman from Masulipatam arrived here on the 25th and, finding little hope of a market, hastened for ‘Ninapooly and adjacent aldeas’; but being ‘tardiff in caminha’, he was overtaken by Cartwright at ‘Baputly’ on the 28th”. Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 232.

Campo (a field, see p. 72).

Here is a citation which contains an earlier instance of the use of compound in Anglo-India than those mentioned in Hobson-Jobson or in the O.E.D.

1676.—“Company’s goods by reason of several thatch hovells within and round about the compound, which are very dangerous in respect of fire, which often happens in Dacca.” Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc., Vol II, p. ccxxxvi. See also instances on the same page and the next.

Canja (in the sense of ‘starch used by Indian washermen, and also in that of ‘rice gruel’, see p. 76).

Below are instances of this word in Anglo-India older than those in Hobson-Jobson or in the O.E.D.; the last is also useful as showing how the Englishman in India, in the seventeenth century, did not disdain 'congee' as a daily beverage, and also as providing an insight into the social practices of that age.

1615—"And finding the Caugee to be dangerous to delay." Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 107.

"Have been endeavouring to procure the goods required 'butt all this tyme itt hath beene soe extreame raynes thatt ncather beater cann beate washer can give cangee, nor wee looke uppon nill." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1622-1623), p. 109.

1665—"Yet about a clock in the afternoon I went out into our Balcony, where wee commonly dine, at which time I found said Mr. Harrington looking upon a Silver hilted sword that he had newly made, and sitting down, I called to my servant for a boule of Congee. . . . which to this instant is my cheifest lickuor, and seeing them merry, had a desire to participate of their mirth, and began to drink to a Portugall that was in the company, in my said liquor. Mr. Harrington, turning towards me, falsely accuses me that in those words I dishonoured him, he imagining that whereas I spake to the aforesaid Portugall, I had asked him to sell his sword, although all they had stood by knew and testified that there was no such word spoken; yet there was no persuading him. . . . To be short, he said I was what he pleased to call me, and strikes at my beare head with his naked sword I having nothing to defend mysele but my boule of Congee." A Factor's Complaint from Porakad, in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LI, p. 109.

1617.—"For the estate of this Achein factory, it may please you, Suratt cloth, as blue baftās. . . . will vent here 500 corge per year; candykeens of Cambaya, two thousand corge per year, yielding cento per cento profit." Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 71.

1615—"Given one of the King's Capados by Mr. Oxwicke: one coarse white baftā of 50 mamodes per corge, cost. . . ." Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 97.

1615—"The Capado would not deliver the said letter until the said officers were satisfied. . . .

To the Capado which brought the letter. . . ." Ibidem, p. 100.

Capitão mór (Captain major, see p. 78). Anglo-Ind. Capt. mor, Capt. more, (obs.).

Mór is a contraction of maór, the earliest form of maior or majior.

1642—"But now, say the Portugalls of St. Thoma, or rather the Capt. More. . . the peace is broke and they expect order from the Viceroy to fall on us." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 44.

See also under Armada in Supplement

Caro (adj. dear). Anglo-Ind. caro (obs.). Neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1626—"By reason of the Dutch's inveterate hate and malice all passages round about us are waylaid, either with a guard of Dutchmen or by the Governor, who they and Malaya together put in; which we make no doubt costs them caro." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1624-1629), p. 131.

Cartaz (a pass, safe-conduct). Anglo-Ind. cartass, cartasse, (obs.). See p. 82. Neither in the O.E.D. nor in Hobson-Jobson.

1618—"If they misenforme not from Mesolapatan, there is great store of indico shipt at some ports to the sowth, all which take cartasses of our enemies." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1618-1621), p. 3.

1618.—"Shee hath her cartasse without stopping at Suratt and upon conclusion sent to mee for my passe, els the merchants would not stirr." Ibidem, p. 4.

1621.—"The Dutch in the Red Sea gave cartasses or assurance to the junks to pass free, and yet most treacherously, to their great infamie, made seisure of six vessels." Ibidem, p. 324.

Castiço (child of Portuguese parents born in India, see p. 85). Anglo-Ind. Castilian, Castez. Not in the O.E.D.

"Kanappa confiscated a quantity of rice, unjustly, defrauding the 'Castilian' who brought it for sale." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 240. Foster conjectures that 'Castilian' here is intended for castiço and it appears rightly so.

"Richard Trenchfield married a Castez." The Diaries of Streynsham Master (1675-80), ed. Temple, Vol. II, p. 284.

1622-23.—"As for the coach, one of the oxen died and the other went lame and had to be sold; 'which is all the proceed of the caveluriree'." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1622-1623), p. 95. In the same volume (p. 45) is also met with the form cavyilluryoo, in the same sense.

Cavaleiro (a horseman, a rider). Anglo-Ind. cavallerous (obs.).

"Had intended to keep their 'ablucks' for sale here, as ordered by the President; but their 'cavallerous' refused to return without them." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1624-1629), p. 232. Abluck is Ar. ablaq, 'a piebald horse'. See also quotation under Adarga in Supplement.

Centopeia (centipede, see p. 92).

Here is an instance of the use of this word in Anglo-India.

1703.—“I shall not presume to trouble your Honours with an account of the insects of this island, only of one, it being a great curiosity, and none of us have ever seen such before; it is a small slender worme, about three inches in length much resembling a centipee only slenderer, and its leggs are shorter, smaller and much more numerous; wherever he creeped or moved in the night he left behind him a traine of light like a bright fire, which would also stick to his fingers and hands that but touch it.” Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. cccxxxiii.

Chá (tea, see p. 93).

Below is a very early instance of the use of the form ‘chawe’ in Anglo-India.

1616.—“I hope you will remember me for the chawe I wished you to buy for me.” Letter of William Eaton from Firando to Richards Wickham (at Miako), dated 22nd June, 1616, in Foster, Letters, Vol. IV, p. 120.

Crooke says that the earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of India is in a letter from R. Wickham, at Firando, in Japan, who writing, June 27th, 1615, to Mr. Eaton at Miako, asks for “a pt. of the best sort of chaw”.

After a collation of both these passages it would appear as though Miaco was then famous for its tea.

Chapa (a seal, impression).

Below are citations to show how in Anglo-India and even in Spanish this Indian term came to be used as a verb.

1618.—“That all presents being showed at the Custome house, that the officers might avoyd deceit, being chopped by both parts.” Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc., p. 508.

1628-37. —“The formons when prepared were read out to the King [of Arakan] who immediately had them chapaed, that is stamped with his Royal chapa, or seal as we call it, that serves as seal and signature at the same time, since no separately written signature is employed.” Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol I, pp. 157 and 158. The Spanish original has “el qual los mandó luego chapar”.

1679.—“Yesterday the Mochelke (muchalka, bond) was chopt (sealed) by the Cadje.” The Diaries of Streynsham Master, ed. Temple, Vol II, p. 276.

1698.—“June 11th. Diary, Wrote an answer...and order’d if such impediments continued about the Towns to get the Nishaan chaup’d with it for delays were dangerous.” Old Fort William in Bengal, ed. C. R. Wilson, Vol. I, p. 37.

Here is a fairly early use of ‘chop’ in the sense of ‘seal’.

one cloth to another." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 275.

Chinche (a bug). Anglo-Ind. chince, chint (obs.).

1673.—"Swarms of Ants, Muskeetoos, Flies, and stinking Chints, Oimices, etc. breed and infest them: This Season we experimented; which though moderately warm, yet our Bodies broke out into small fiery Pimples.... augmented by Muskeeto-Rites and Chinces raising Blisters on us." Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 100.

"Notwithstanding Chints, Fleas, and Muskeeto's torment them every Minute, [the 'Banyans'] dare not presume to scratch where it itches, lest some Relation should be untenanted its miserable abode." Ibidem, p. 231.

Chita (printed cotton cloth, see p. 104).

Here is an early instance of the use of this term in Anglo-India.

1690.—"In some things the Artists of India out-do all the Ingenuity of Europe, viz., in the painting of Chites or *Callico*es." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 167.

Chuname (prepared lime, see p. 105).

The following is an Anglo-Indian form of this word mentioned neither in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1583-91.—"And all the time which they ('Chinians') mourne they keepe the dead in the house; the bowels being taken out and filled with chownam or lime, and coffined, and when the time is expired they carry them out playing and piping, and burne them." Ralph Fitch in Foster, Early Travels, O.U.P., p. 42.

The Portuguese borrowed the word kumbalanu, 'a pumpkin', from one of the South Dravidian languages. The Anglo-Ind. form is not in the O.E.D.

1679.—"This cuntry [Achin] affordeth Severall Excellent good fruites, Namely: Duryans, Mangastinos, Oranges, the best in India or South Seas, comparable with the best of China, Lemons, Limes, Ramastines [Litchis], Bolangos, Monsoone plums [Zizyphus Jujuba or bér], Pumple Moooses [see under Toranja, p. 350], etc., and the trees beare fruit both green and ripe all the yeare alonge." Bowrey, Countries round the Bay of Bengal, Hak. Soc., p. 323.

Comprador (a purchaser, see p. 115).

Below is an early Anglo-Indian instance of the use of this word, earlier than any in Hobson-Jobson or in the O.E.D.

1614.—"I make John Phebe did deliver you the two fishes and letter I wrote you yesterday. He is now grown stately and will not serve in the English house for comprador." Foster, Letters, Vol. II (1613-1615), p. 227.

Concerto (repair). Anglo-Ind. conserta (obs.).

"Consertas de Terras" (of lands). . . .x1. 19. 13. Yearley Rent Rowle of Bombaim, etc., in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIV, p. 1.

Covado (a cubit, see p. 126).

Below are a few other Anglo-Ind. forms of this word none of which are to be found either in Hobson-Jobson or in the O.E.D., and they belong to an earlier date than those mentioned therein.

1615.—"The measure is called a covett, whereof there is two, one whereby our English cloth is only sold by, of length $35\frac{1}{2}$ inches; the other, whereby all other commodity is sold by, is of length $26\frac{1}{2}$ inches." Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 11.

1616.—"Good silks cost 10 rupees their cobda, and mean cloth of gold 35 and 40 rupees a cobda." Idem, Vol. IV, p. 20.

"For the crimson French 'shagge' Āsaf Khān offers fifteen rupees the covado, 'which is an English yard within three inches'." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1618-1621), p. 21.

"Mistake made at Surat in the length of the Patna coved." Ibidem, p. 236.

Curral (a cattle pen, see p. 130).

It would appear from an illustration in Tennent's Ceylon (1859), Vol. I, p. 211, that the Anglo-Indian form of this word was employed not only to denote the enclosure for capturing wild elephants but also one for catching fish.

Discalsado (barefooted). Anglo-Ind. discalsadoe (obs.). This form is not in the O.E.D. which has 'discalceate' in the same sense.

1616.—"No, he hath a Discalsadoe Portugall for his confessor." Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc., p. 130.

Elephanta (the name given to storms at the beginning or setting in of the Monsoon, see p. 140).

Below is a reference to the 'Elephanta' of an earlier date than the earliest mentioned in the body of this book.

1611.—"The storm of Ofante doth begin and endureth 2 or 3 days." Foster, Letters, Vol. I, p. 126.

1621.—"A crwell night of raine and thunder and of lightning . . . this raine and lightning was called by the peaplle the olliphante, which cometh once a yeare." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1618-1621), p. 286.

It is interesting to note that, speaking of what is now called 'Elephanta Island' (see p. 142), Fryer uses the masculine form 'Elephanto' which is nearer the original 'A Ilha do Elephante' than the present 'Elephanta', feminine in form :

1673.—“These Islands are in number seven: Bombaim, Canorein, Trumbay, Elephanto, the Putachoes, Munchumbay, and Kerenjau, with the Rock of Henry Kenry.” Vol. I, p. 159.

“Having in a Week’s time completed my Business, returning the same way, we steered by the South side of the Bay, purposely to touch at Elephanto, so called from a monstrous Elephant cut out of the main Rock, bearing a Young one on its Back.” Ibidem, p. 194.

Escrito (a writing, see p. 147).

The quotation below would lead one to the view that this Portuguese word was used not only in the sense of ‘a note under one’s hand or attestation’, but also in the sense of ‘a hasty note’ in which ‘chit’ is used to-day in India. The word in this sense is not in the O.E.D.

1615.—“All your letters having been liker to screets than letters.” Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 154.

See also quotation under Scrivão in Supplement.

Escritorio (a writing desk, see p. 148).

The quotations below are of an early date, provide new forms of the word, some of which are not found in the O.E.D., and go to show what a brisk trade there was in these desks between the Far East and India as early as the beginning of the seventeenth century.

1615-1616.—“Among other things I should mention a great number of cabinets of all patterns, in the fashion of those of Germany. This is an article the most perfect and of the finest workmanship to be seen anywhere; for they are all of choice woods, and inlaid with ivory, mother-of-pearl, and precious stones; in place of iron they are mounted with gold. The Portuguese call them Escritorios de la China.” Pyrard, Voyage, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, pp. 176 and 177.

1617.—“There are two scriptoris which are sealed up to be delivered to you by Mr. Mothwold.” Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 27.

1617.—“I sent a gold box by Richard Kinge to buy me some skrettores of mackee [maki-ye = lacquer] work.” Ibidem, p. 104.

1617.—“I have sent by this bearer seventeen sundry parcels of contores and scrittores marked with R. W. [Richard Wickham]. The freight of them I pray pay to the master how much it is. . . . I have been at Meaco and talked with the makeman [maker of lacquered goods] who hath promised that in short time he will have done. He hath fifty men that worketh night and day; that, so far as I see, he doth his endeavour.” Ibidem, p. 169.

1617.—“I give you thanks for the book of Sir Walter Rawli’s which you sent me; and have no good thing to send unto you, only two small scritoris.” Ibidem, p. 266.

1690.—“It [Suratt] is renown’d for Traffick through all Asia, both for rich Silks. . . . and for Agatts, Cornelians Niggancees, Desks, Scrutores, and Boxes neatly polisht and embellisht, which may be purchas'd here at vory reasonable Rates." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 131.

"I cannot boast of the Lack upon Scrutores and Tables at Suratt, which is but ordinary in respect of that at Japan." Ibidem, p. 167.

Estanque (the shop or place where the estaqueiro or monopolist had licence to sell certain commodities for his own profit). Anglo-Ind. stanck (obs.).

1668.—"Stanck of tobacco imports . . . x 10,225.00.00." Yearley Rent Roule of Bombaim, in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIV, p. 1.

Estocada (a thrust with a rapier). Anglo-Ind. stochado (obs.). This form is not in the O.E.D.

1673.—"The MASS of the People [of Goa] are Canorein, though Portuguezed in Speech and Manners; paying great Observance to a White Man, whom when they meet they must give him the way with a Cringe and Civil Salute, for fear of a Stochado." Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 27.

Feitiço (sorcery, see p. 154).

Here is an uncommon form of this word.

1690—"They (the Africans) Travel no where without their Fateish about them, one of which looked like the small end of a Stag's Horn, with a Bell tied to it, about the bigness of a Man's Thumb. . . . To these Fateishes they ascribe their Security from Peril and Mischief." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 44.

Fidalgo (one nobly descended, see p. 155). Anglo-Ind. phydalgo, fidalgo.

1642.—"Being truly informed which was the homicide, we kept him and suffered the others to departe for St. Thoma; from whence wee received many letters to release him, for that he was a phydalgo." Foster, Eng Fact. (1612-1645), p. 43

1673.—"The Fidalgos have stately Dwellings, graced with covered Balconies, and large Windows two Stories high, with Panes of Oister shell, which is their usual Glazing among them in India." Fryer, East India, Vol. I, p. 192. See also quotations under Aldeia and Bacamorte in Supplement.

1665.—"I writt about a rent that did belong to the King that might import to about 700 or 800 li. per annum, for the Knife that was to prune the Cocer nutt tree [known as the Coito tax, see Ind. Antiq., LIV, p. 2], it hath proved incerte, for since by papers I find it belongs to the Owners or Foreiros [see below] of the ground for which they pay unto his Majesty what appeares by theyr Foralls, so that it proved a fals information." Khan, Anglo-Portuguese Negotiations, etc. O.U.P., p. 476.

Foreiro (a tenant who paid the quit rent, see p. 160).

The following quotation is illustrative not only of the early use of this term in an Anglo-Indian document but also of the hatred in which the chief 'foreiros' or revenue farmers of Portuguese days were regarded by the people of Bombay.

1604.—"Whereas this Island being formerly belonging to the Crowne of Portugall, there were in each Division thereof Foreiros Mayores or Cheife Farmers, men powerfule, arrogant, and Exorbitant violators, Ecclesiastiques as well as Civil; whose manner of Government was absolute, bringing the inferior sort of us so much under, and made so small accompt of them, as comparatively wee may say the Elephant doeth of the Ant.

Wherefore, we humbly beseech your Majesty for the love of God and the wounds of Jesus Christ, to take pity and compassion on us by not consenting to alienate us from your Government, and the Obedience thereof upon any Consideration or agreement whatsoever; neither to permitt any more Foreiros Mayores in this Island." Petition to Charles II in Khan, Anglo-Portuguese Negotiations, O.U.P., p. 451 et. seq.

Fresco (subst., a cool wind, see p. 161).

The following quotation not only illustrates the use of the above word in Anglo-India but furnishes a very vivid and interesting account of the hot season in Gujarat.

1689.—"In the Middle of May, before the Southerly Winds set in, which bring the Rains along with them, the Air at Surat is so very dry, that it licks up the Moisture in the Pen, before we are able to write it out; and so intensely Hot, especially about 3 in the Afternoon, that we cannot endure the standing for any long time upon the Grass, where the Sun's Beams have their full force. This causes our sprinkling the Floors of our Chambers frequently with Water, to create a kind of Fresco in them, during this Season, and makes us Employ our Peons in Fanning of us with Murchals made of Peacock's Feathers, four or five Foot long, in the time of our Entertainments and when we take our Repose." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., pp. 82 and 83.

Fusta (a pinnacle or small ship, with sails, or oars).—Anglo-Ind. fusto, fuste (obs.). These forms are not in the O.E.D.

1614.—"The king keepeth there (Reshire) continually 100 fustoes and galleys with them to cut off all passengers that offer to go from Ormus to Balsora." Foster, Letters, Vol. II (1613-1615), p. 146.

1615.—"It is hoped that the Osian-der will be there to carry them before the fustes can arrive." Ibidem, Vol. III, p. 19.

Galeota (a small galley, see p. 164).

The following note of Foster (Letters, Vol. III, p. 296) throws new light on the derivation of Anglo-Ind. gallevat which Dalgado says is derived from the Port. galeota, which is also the view of the O.E.D.

"It has been suggested in the Bombay Gazetteer (Vol. XIII, p. 717) that the term jolly-boat is derived from galivat: the native name for large row-boats much in use on the west coast of India; and this etymology has been adopted by Sir Henry Yule (Hobson-Jobson) and Admiral Smyth (Sailors' Wordbook). But jollyvatt as an English word is at least as old as 1495-97 (see Oppenheim's Naval Accounts and Inventories, Navy Records Society, Vol. III, p. 193, etc.), and there seems to be every probability that it is simply a corruption of galliot, a small galley. If there be any direct relation between the English and the Indian term, it is more likely that the latter was derived from the former than the former from the latter."

Gallina (a hen): Anglo-Ind. gallina, a name given reproachfully to the Portuguese by English sailors in the seventeenth century.

1690.—"The Portuguese are mightily sunk, as well in their Courage, as in their Fame and Fortune, and are found to be such contemptible Enemies, that they are seldom discours'd of but with Reproach by the name of Gallina's, i.e. Hen-Hearted Fellow's." Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 254.

Gelva, more us. gelba (a small vessel used in the Red Sea). Anglo-Ind. jeloa, jellia. Not in the O.E.D.

The Port. word is from the Ar. jilba. Did Anglo-Ind. receive the word directly from Ar. or through Portuguese? Probably from the latter, regard being had to the forms above and to the fact that Portuguese chroniclers use the word from as early as the beginning of the sixteenth century.

1634.—"And now both their and our small vessells will be more usefull than ever, for there's noe thought of trade into the Bay without them, our greater shippes riding so farre from the shoare, and the Kinge of Arrackans jelliaes or small boats of warre ever scoutinge 'twixt them and the land." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1634-1636), p. 43.

Gentio (a Hindu, see p. 167).

Here are early instances of the use of this term in Anglo-India.

1642.—"Whither Your Worshippes have imployment or no, men cannot goe naked, as the Gentews doe." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 54.

1645.—"The manning of her [the Advice] is a difficulty unless they take some soldiers out of the Fort and fill up with 'Jentue saylors'." Ibidem, p. 282.

Below is an early instance of this term employed in the sense of the Telugu language :

1645.—“This instant wee received a letter from the King by two of our owne servants. . . The translate of that letter out of Jentue into English we send unto you for your perusal.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 291.

Jaca (jack-fruit, see p. 178).

The citation below is of interest, not only because it is of a fairly early date, but because it helps to show what keen observers the old travelers were, and how keenly and sympathetically they were interested in obtaining and setting down information about the fauna or flora new to them.

1637.—“The ancients called this island [Ceylon] the healthy, pleasant, fertile, flourishing and rich Taprobane. Healthy on account of its temperate climate and lovely air; fertile owing to numerous streams of excellent water. . . . ; pleasant owing to the fact that most of its mountains and forests are filled with aromatic cassia or cinnamon. . . . , or else of great leafy fruit-trees like the bread-fruit which bears a sort of apple of huge size, called jack-fruit. Outside they are covered with small prickles which, although sharp to the touch, do not prevent one's getting at the kernel, which is enclosed in a yellow, sweet pulp, very pleasant to the taste. From this pulp, and from the kernel many dishes are prepared which are most excellent and delicious. Mother Nature, in her foresight, perceiving that the branches would not suffice to support so great a weight, arranged for this fruit to sprout from the trunk itself, by throwing out roots or stems, which are so strong that, unless you have a knife or other sharp instrument, it is difficult to get them off.” Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, pp. 448 and 449.

Jagra (coarse sugar, see p. 179).

The quotations from Fitch and Terry (p. 179) show how by jagra they meant the ‘coco-nut or the coco-nut tree’. The latter of the two citations below will show how jaggery was a term applied to spirit obtained from palm-sugar, and the former how the form jagra in its correct meaning of ‘palm sugar’, was in vogue earlier than jaggery.

1630.—“April 18. Took some coco-nuts and ‘jagra’ from a Malabar junk.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 133.

Jangada (a raft formed by two boats lashed together with boards across them, see p. 181).

The quotations below are of interest because they contain a new form of this word, not mentioned in Hobson-Jobson nor found in the O.E.D.

1632.—“They have got all the sangrees of this side Bapatly and of all the rivers unto the iland among them, and all the towne boats are to goe to them this day.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 233.

1678.—“In the morning we went downe to the River about 2 miles from Collepellee [Kallepalli] where was two great Metchlepatam Boates, and two Sangarees or Gun boates.” The Diaries of Streynsham Master (1675-80), ed. Temple, Vol. II, p. 139.

Manga (mango).

The quotations below go to show the various forms that were current in Anglo-India before the present form became stabilised.

1615.—“Two jars of manges at rupees 4½.” Foster, Letters, Vol. III (1615), p. 41.

“Two jars of mangas.” Ibidem, p. 83.

“I had in her some few cloves, the rest of her cargazon being jars of pickled nutmegs and mangoes.” Ibidem, p. 286.

For the form “mongoes” see quotation from Fryer under ‘Achar,’ in Supplement.

Manilha (bracelet, see p. 216).

“They [the women of Goa] wear also bracelets, called Manile from the hand up to the elbow.” Manrique, Travels, Hak. Soc.

“Manila, or wrist jewel.” Hamilton, New Account, Vol. I, p. 303.

Marinha (a salt pan). Anglo-Ind. marinho (obs.).

“Pomela. A marinho of salt x 21.01. 35.” Yearley Rent Rowle of Bombaim, in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIV, p. 2.

Mesquita (a mosque, see p. 225).

Below is a quotation from an Anglo-Indian writer which contains a form of masjid neither mentioned in Hobson-Jobson nor in the O.E.D.

1664.—“A fresh recrute of men coming of about 20 more, wee than began to consider what houses neere us might be most prejuditiall, and on one side wee tooke possession of [a] pagod or Banian idol temple, which was just under our house....., on the other a Moorish Mescete where severall people were harboured.” The Rev. John L. Escalio's Account of Sivaji's Raid upon Surat in Ind. Antiq., Vol. L, p. 317.

Mestiço (a half-breed, see p. 226).

The following contains a very strange Anglo-Indian form of the word not mentioned in Hobson-Jobson but in the O.E.D., as ‘mostesa’.

1652.—“Friar Ephraim who was pastor or curate unto the Mostezaes of Madraspatam.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 92.

Monção (monsoon, see p. 229).

Below is a very strange Anglo-Indian form which, if Yule's conjecture that the Anglo-Indian monsoon proceeds directly from the Dutch monssoyn or monssoen is correct, perhaps marks a transition stage between the present Anglo-Indian word and the Dutch term. It is not found in the O.E.D.

1642.—“Wee have in this our 15 or 16 monthes residence throughly experienced the trade of this place, and doe finde that the first markets at the begining of the monzoane is most profitablist.... Beside the country people, having then fully supplied themselves, returns not till the next moonzoane to replenish their wants” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), pp. 57 and 58.

Morador (an inhabitant). Konk. morādor.—Anglo-Ind. moredor (obs.).

In the Konkani of Goa the word is used in the specific sense of an inhabitant of a village of which he is not a member or a ‘componente’.

1632.—“Whereon one Grua Redie [Guruva Reddi], a moredor of Mond-rero, ... gathered head, to the number of three or four hundred in armes.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 233.

Morim (a thin white cloth for shirting). Anglo-Ind. mooree, morye, moory (obs.).

The O.E.D. derives the Anglo-Ind. word from Portuguese, but Sir Richard Temple (Ind. Antiq., Vol. L, Supp. p. 9) is of the view that the Port. morim is more likely a corruption of mûri than that mûri is a corruption of morim, as it was a common custom of the Portuguese in adopting Oriental names ending in i to add a final m or n. Morim means ‘Moor cloth’, i.e. cloths intended primarily for Mohammedan wear. It was cotton cloth manufactured principally in the Nellore district of Madras for sale to the Mohammedans of the Malay peninsula. It is identical with Salampore. The earliest instance of the use of this word in the O.E.D. is of 1696.

1618.—“Such severall sorts of goods as Bantam requires, viz. white moryes, white percallaes, white salampor-yes, white and redde beteles, dragons malaia, dragons salala, fine gobare serasses, fine tappy serasses, fine and course Japon tappes, tape chindees, tape anacke, caine goulons, and such like." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1618-1621), pp. 42 and 43.

1644.—"Goods most proper for this place are all sorts of Mesulapatam or Coast clothing, as long cloth, morees sallampores, homoomies, saloes, serasses, etc." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-45), p. 223.

The above citations contain some very uncommon names of textiles.

Ouvidor (a magistrate, see p. 245).

Here is an early instance of the use of this term in Anglo-India. The word is not in the O.E.D.

1644.—"Did their best to 'corrupt both the Kings Fitscall and Ovedores' with offers of money to procure leave to sell their goods this year and depart" Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 224.

Padre (priest, see p. 245). Nicob. pater.

"In the seventeenth century at least, and probably much earlier Haensel speaks of pater=sorcerer, and Pere Barbe of deos and reos=God, as survivals of Portuguese missionaries." Ind. Antiq., Vol. LX (Feb.), p. 38.

Pão (in the sense of 'loaf or boat shaped ingot of gold', see pp. 265 and 266). Anglo-Ind. pam.

1615.—"It is impossible to tell all the great riches and all the rare and beautiful things which these ships [trading between Japan and Goa] bring back; among others they bring much gold in ingots, which the Portuguese call pandoro (= pão de ouro). Pyrard, Voyage, Hak. Soc., Vol. II, p. 176.

1634.—"The galliots from that country brought rich cargoes, insomuch that two thousand Loaves of gold were registered in the royal customshouse [at Goa], to say nothing of the gold and merchandise that escape registration." Foster, Eng. Fact., 1634-36, p. 33.

1676.—"Taking all chances, he offered the piece to Marin for two pains of Chinese gold, and the golden pain is equal to 600 livres of our money." Tavernier, Travels in India, ed. Ball, O.U.P., Vol. II, pp. 110 and 111.

1676.—"They were instructed to present to the General of Batavia 200 loaves (pains) of gold to redeem the royal fortress." Ibidem, p. 238.

"We, Edward Jones and John Scattergood.....confess to have received from the hands of Manuel Tavacho, resident of the city of Macao, one parcel wrapped in white cloth with fine red wax seals.....in which it is said are contained fifteen pams, one bar and three pieces of good gold....." The Scattergoods and the East India Co., in Ind. Antiq., Vol. LX, Suppl. p. 77.

The term 'pão de ouro' (and inversely ouro de pão, to denote a superior quality of the metal) was used by Portuguese chroniclers from as early as 1545. See Dalgado, Glossário Lus. As., Vol. II, p. 165. The expression 'pão' was also used of silver, whence the phrase 'pão de prata' (silver ingot). In the East India Co.'s records these ingots whether of gold or silver were usually called 'shoes'. See Hobson-Jobson, s.v. Shoe of Gold.

Parau (a small vessel used in war or trade, see p. 269).

Here is an earlier instance of the use of this term in Anglo-India than any mentioned in Hobson-Jobson.

1653—"Another prau sent to find the Dove... Have just heard that the Dove has been taken. She might have been saved had there been enough Englishmen here to man the prau instead of natives." Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 190.

Fryer uses the very unusual form 'provoes'.

1673—"They are owners of several small Provoes, of the same make, and Canooses, cut out of one intire piece of Wood." Fryer, East India, Vol. I, p. 65.

Partido (a consignment). Anglo-Ind. partido, partitho (obs.). Not in O.E.D.

1617—"Some good quantities we procured... and to enlarge our investments the more, we bought also some partidoes on credit to pay at two and three months' time." Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 236.

"After the partitho of silk he took was made up and fit to be embarked it lay there three weeks and above before he durst ship it." Ibidem, p. 139.

Patacho (a pinnace). Anglo-Ind. patash (obs.) This form is not met with in the O.E.D.

1630.—"Do not believe the information regarding the number of frigates and 'patashes', for Hari Vaisya's brother writes from Damān that the force there consists only of the fourteen frigates... and eight 'fustoes' belonging to Ruy Freire" Foster, Eng. Fact. (1630-1633), p. 98.

Pateca (water-melon, see p. 275). Anglo-Ind. pateca, putacho (obs.).

1673.—"From hence [Elephanta] we sailed to the Putachoes, a Garden of Melons (Putacho being a melon)...." Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 195. See also under Elephanta.

Fryer's Putachoes was called in Portuguese Ilha de Patecas and in Anglo-India Island of Pattecas, see Ind. Antiq., Vol. LIV, p. 3. By 1724 the 'Island of Patecas or Patachoes' came to be corrupted into 'Butcher's Island', the name by which this island near Bombay is still known to this day.

Paulista (a Jesuit, see p. 277). Malayal. Paulistákkār.

Sampâluṣpâtirimâr (San Paolo Padres) and Yêsuṣvittanmâr (Jesuits). See Ind. Antiq., Vol. LVI, p. 85 n.—Anglo-Ind. Paulistine.

1673.—“Near our Landing-place [at Bandra] stood a College, not inferior to the Building, nor much unlike those of our Universities, belonging to the Jesuits here, more commonly called Paulistines. . . . who live here very sumptuously, the greatest part of the Island being theirs.” Fryer, East India, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 183.

“The Paulistines enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch; in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary’s Shop well furnished with Medicines.” Fryer, East India, Vol. II, p. 11.

Peru (turkey, see p. 283).

We have said that the turkey was introduced into India by the Portuguese (p. 284). The quotations below are links in the story of its dissemination throughout the East and go to show how by the end of the 17th century it had become a fairly common bird in India.

1615.—William Edwards from Admeare [Ajmere] writes to the East India Co.: “Three or four turkeycocks and hens would do well for the Mogul; he hath two cocks but no hens, and would esteem much of their brood.” Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 19.

1617.—Edward Connok in Persia writes to the East India Co.: “I had almost forgotten to adjoin these other toys by this king required: . . . Turkey cocks and hens, as many as you please to send. He hath caused me write for peacocks into India, where are plenty. Noither them nor turkeys he never saw; this country affordeth none.” Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 44.

1678-9. —“The Havaladar [of ‘Armagon’] brought us two sheep, a goate, a Hogg, 2 Turkeys, 10 hens, a great deal of rice, butter, spice, Toddy, Corne and grass for our horses, and gave all the Peons rice.” The Diaries of Streynsham Master, ed. Temple, Vol. II, p. 131.

Procurador (attorney, see p. 301).

Here is an early instance of the use of this word in Anglo-India. Not mentioned in the O.E.D.

1615.—“His name is Usseph Chann, who desired me he might present me to the king and be my Procuradore.” Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 14.

Risco (risk). Anglo-Ind. risgoe (obs.).

1676 —“This Deponent answered Mr. Hall, the Company had already run the Risgoe thus farr and might now run it soe much further, and Reape the profit of it themselves.” The Diaries of Streynsham Master, ed. Temple, Vol. I, p. 485.

Scrivão (clerk or writer, see p. 149).

1615.—“To the scrivano of the Custom House ” Foster, Letters, Vol. III, p. 100.

Below is an unusual form not found in Hobson-Jobson.

1623.—“The reason why the bakers, etc., have not come down in the behaviour of the ‘screivas’, etc., in custom house, who will not give them a chittee without som feeling [feeling?]: but on his threatening to go again to the Governor the desired ‘screete’ was granted.” See under Escrito, p. 390. Foster, Eng. Fact. (1622-1623), p. 265.

Senhor (lord, see p. 325).

From the quotation below it would appear that, just as Indians used to give this title ‘Senhor’ to Englishmen, the latter used it of the chief foreign officials in India, not necessarily Portuguese—in the passage in question they are all Dutch.

1676.—“Concerning the affairs of the Dutch Company in this place [Metchlepatam] I understand that Senr. Coler... is by orders lately come from Batavia to be Governor of Pullicat... Senr. Peter Smith... is to be Cheife at Metchlepatam, and Senr. Hartsing, the Cheife at Golcondah.” The Diaries of Streynsham Master, ed. Temple, Vol. I, p. 297. This is an earlier instance of the use of this word than the one in the O.E.D. which is of 1795.

Sumbaia (a profound reverence, see pp. 330 and 332).

1614.—“We delivered his Majesty’s letter, obtaining what we required, only confined to such orders and customs (though bad) as the Dutch before us had brought in as of Sombay or presents, customs, rents.” Foster, Letters, Vol. II (1613-1615), p. 112.

Taça (a cup, see p. 338).

In supporting the view that the Anglo-Ind. toss was derived from Portuguese and not from Persian, we remarked that the Persian tās ‘a cup’ had not acquired currency in Hindi or Urdu and that the word for ‘cup’ in the former was pyālā. The following quotation appears to bear out our statement.

1608-11.—“At the end are drawne many portraitures of the King [of Delhi] in state sitting amongst his women, one holding a flask of wine, another a napkin, a third presenting the peally [small cup]; behind, one punkawing [fanning], another holding his sword.” William Finch, in Foster, Early Travels, O.U.P., p. 164.

Terranquim (a small swift bark, see p. 343).

We have pointed out that this Portuguese form is not the original of the Anglo-Ind. trankey which comes from the Pers. trankeh. Here are a couple of passages in which Anglo-Indian forms of the word, different from those mentioned before, are to be found and they are of a date earlier than those in Hobson-Jobson.

1645.—“Their goods were transferred to a ‘greate tranka’.” Foster, Eng. Fact. (1642-1645), p. 273.

1651.—“The Arrabs of Muskatt soe much awe them [the Portuguese] with vessells which they have taken from them, and their own trancketts, that they dare not at this tyme pass in the Gulph, though they are (as they tearme themselves) an Armadoe (besides theise merchantmen) of six garrobs” [see Garopo, p. 166]. Foster, Eng. Fact. (1651-1654), p. 64.

Topaz (a Portuguese half breed, see p. 346).

There are a number of instances of this word, used by the Jesuits in the 16th and early 17th centuries in the sense of ‘interpreter’, given in the Ind. Antiq., Vol. LII, p. 263.

Tornado (violent storm). Anglo-Ind. turnado, turnathe, tronado (obs.). The last two forms are not in the O.E.D.

1617.—“And being in the latitude of the Cape we steered away S.S.E. with a meridian compass till we came into 0° 24’ of N. latitude, where we met the turnath[es?] and lay becalmed and troubled with the variable winds twenty-one days.” Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 290.

1617.—“But to proceed: you may please to know that the last of April we passed the turnathes.” Ibidem, p. 291.

1690.—“Here likewise we were affrighted with a Turnado which, without Care and speedy handing of our Sails, might have endanger’d our Ship.” Ovington, Voyage to Surat, O.U.P., p. 27.

1636.—“From the 10th May unto the 6th curreant, we accompted ourselves to bee in the Tronados, it being extraordinary variable weather, as Calmes, sodaine and violent gusts, the wind on all points of the compasse in 24 howeres.” Mundy, Travels, Vol. III, pt. I, p. 30.

Toronja (‘the pomelo’, see p. 350).

In connection with this fruit and the question about its introduction into India, it is useful to quote Prof. S. H. Hodivala (Ind. Antiq., LXI, p. 32) who says that the Citrus decumana is mentioned in the Bâburnâma, if Erskine’s and Mr. Beveridge’s interpretation of the emperor’s description of the Sadâphal is to be relied on. “The Sadâphal,” he writes, “is another orange-like fruit. This is pear-shaped, colours like the quince, ripens sweet, but not to the sickly-sweetness of the orange” (naranj). Tran. A. S. Beveridge, p. 512. If the Sadâphal of Bâbur was the Citrus decumana, the fruit must have been known in India long before the XVII century”.

Tromba (a species of reed met with near the Cape of Good Hope).—Anglo-Ind. strumblowes. Not in the O.E.D.

1615.—“Fifty or sixty leagues out are seen floating in vast numbers the stalks of reeds, with about nine or ten reeds (more or less) attached to each stalk, these are called trombas.” Pyrrard, Voyage, Hak. Soc., Vol. I, p. 20.

“These trombas are a kind of groat canes, about the bignesse of a man’s arm, and throe or four foot long, which flote upon the water with their roots.” Mandelslo, Travels, cit. by Gray in note to passage above.

Tufão (hurricane, see p. 353).

Below is an early Anglo-Indian reference :

1617.—“Two of these Dutch ships were full laden with silk and stuffs which they had taken from the Chinas, as also two junks with the like; but by means of a storm or tuffon the two Holland ships and one junk were driven ashore.” Foster, Letters, Vol. VI, p. 260.

Tutanaga (an alloy, see p. 356).

“Their tutinggle they [the Dutch] bring from Tiwan” [Taiwan, i.e., Formosa]. Eng. Fact. (1642-1643), p. 36.

Varanda (verandah, see p. 358).

The citations below give evidence of earlier use of this term in Anglo-India than do those in Hobson-Jobson.

1718.—“But if the making of such a Compound and Virandas for depositing and securing the Merchants Goods will be so great a convenience...we permit you to make it” Old Fort William in Bengal, ed. Wilson, Vol. I, p. 37.

1758.—“Ordered Mr. Bartholomew Plaisted to survey the Verandah.” Ibidem, p. 34.

1756.—“They [the Nabob’s troops] had infinitely the advantage over us in this attack as they could fire upon our men from the tops, windows and verandas of houses which stood close to and overlooked our lines and batteries.” Ibidem, Vol. III, p. 295.

Visitador (official visitor), see pp. 367 and 368.

The quotation below bears out the statement made before (p. 368) that the Dutch adopted this Portuguese word for one of their officials.

1614.—“The first of this month arrived here a Dutch ship coming in three months from Bantam, and in her there comes the Visitador General for the Dutch to visit these coasts.” Foster, Letters, Vol. II (1613-1615), p. 165.

ALPHABETICAL LISTS OF WORDS IN ASIATIC LANGUAGES DERIVED FROM OR INFLUENCED BY PORTUGUESE

Attention to the following points will facilitate reference: Against every Asiatic vocable is set the Portuguese word from which it derives. Vocables printed in italics are not listed herein for reasons mentioned in the Introduction and in all such cases the English equivalent of the Portuguese word is given after it within brackets. The vernacular idiom is sometimes mentioned after the Asiatic word derived from Portuguese in which case it is invariably enclosed within brackets, thus: Negosiānt (yepāri) Negociante (merchant). The peculiar sense which a word has acquired is set in quotation marks and brackets. The following additional abbreviations occur: S=Supplement; (S) denotes that the word to which it is annexed must be looked for in the Supplement, and (C) that the word is current only among Christians; eccles=ecclesiastical term; mus=musical term; leg=legal term; med=medical term; arch=archaic; us. fig.=used figuratively.

ORIENTAL INSTITUTE, BARODA

SELECT OPINIONS

Sylvain Levi : The Gaekwad's Series is standing at the head of the many collections now published in India.

Asiatic Review, London : It is one of the best series issued in the East as regards the get up of the individual volumes as well as the able editorship of the series and separate works.

Presidential Address, Patna Session of the Oriental Conference : Work of the same class is being done in Mysore, Travancore, Kashmir, Benares, and elsewhere, but the organisation at Baroda appears to lead.

Indian Art and Letters, London : The scientific publications known as the "Oriental Series" of the Maharaja Gaekwar are known to and highly valued by scholars in all parts of the world.

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, London : Thanks to enlightened patronage and vigorous management the "Gaekwad's Oriental Series" is going from strength to strength.

Sir Jadunath Sarkar, Kt. : The valuable Indian histories included in the "Gaekwad's Oriental Series" will stand as an enduring monument to the enlightened liberality of the Ruler of Baroda and the wisdom of his advisers.

The Times Literary Supplement, London : These studies are a valuable addition to Western learning and reflect great credit on the editor and His Highness.
